

Vaudeville Follies
The Theatre Awards
Adult Puppets

Australia's magazine of the performing arts
July 1977 $1.95

THEATRE AUSTRALIA

THE ROYAL HAYMARKET THEATRE.

MELBOURNE GARRICK CLUB

Has the honor to announce that it will give a performance at the above Theatre, on

MONDAY, 1st JUNE, 1863,

at and on the invited scene of the
EASTERN HILL VOLUNTEER ORDERLY ROOM
UNDER THE DISTINGUISHED PATRONAGE OF

His Excellency the Governor, Sir Henry Barkly, K.C.B.,
(President of the Club.)

THE HON. THE CHIEF SECRETARY, JOHN O'SHANASSY, Esq.; THE HON. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, R. D. IRELAND, Esq.;
THE HON. THE TREASURER, W. C. HAINES, Esq.;

The Right worshipful THE MAYOR; COLONEL ANDERSON, Commanding Volunteers, and OFFICERS of the STAFF; CAPTAINS RAYN and SPRENT, and OFFICERS and MEMBERS of the VOLUNTEER CORPS.

THE EXCELLENT
BAND OF THE COLLINGWOOD RIFLES
WILL PERFORM SELECTIONS DURING THE ENTERTAINMENT.

The performance will commence with Tom Taylor's Comedy, in three acts, entitled

THE VICTIMS. OR, THE REAL AND THE IDEAL.

Mr. Merryweather (a stock broker) . . . . .	Mr. Jones (a lawyer) . . . . .	Mr. Hanley (an India merchant) . . . . .	Mr. J. B. Paine . . . . .
Mr. Finkerton (a literary gentleman) . . . . .	Mr. S. H. Brown . . . . .	Mr. Battersby (an Irish and London admirer) . . . . .	Mr. W. H. Merriam . . . . .
Mr. Harbottle (an editor) . . . . .	Mr. J. H. Wilson . . . . .	Mr. Huddington (a metaphysician) . . . . .	Mr. Lloyd . . . . .
Mr. Cardie (a sexton) . . . . .	Mr. Marmont . . . . .	Carlotta (Merryweather's lady) . . . . .	Mr. Harrow . . . . .
Miss Merryweather . . . . .	Miss Rose Marmont . . . . .	Mrs. Finkerton . . . . .	Miss Dancy Goss . . . . .
Miss Green (a strong-minded woman) . . . . .	Miss Stevens . . . . .	Sarah (Miss Merryweather's maid) . . . . .	Miss Marian Deane . . . . .
Miss Sharp . . . . .	Miss Leane . . . . .	Mary Bingle . . . . .	Miss Dora Bingle . . . . .

OVERTURE TO "NORMA"

COLLINGWOOD BAND.

After which Mr. W. H. WILLIAMS will sing a new Patriotic Song.

THE BRITISH VOLUNTEERS

Mus. by J. R. SOTHERS, Esq.; Words by Mr. S. H. BAKER, of the Collingwood Rifles, dedicated to the Colonel Commandant and Volunteers of Toronto.

SELECTION OF IRISH MELODIES.

COLLINGWOOD BAND.

To conclude with Lemus Rode's Farce, in two acts,

HIS FIRST CHAMPAGNE!

Mr. Martin . . . . .	Mr. W. Devereux . . . . .	Henri Craven, A.M. . . . .	Mr. W. H. Merriam . . . . .
Capitaine Smith . . . . .	Mr. Wynn . . . . .	Richard Wall . . . . .	Mr. J. B. Paine . . . . .
Thomas O'Connell . . . . .	Mr. Marmont . . . . .	Clump . . . . .	Mr. Jones . . . . .
. . . . .	. . . . .	. . . . .	. . . . .
Mr. Martin . . . . .	Mrs. Stevens . . . . .	Emily . . . . .	Miss Marian Deane . . . . .
Harriet Bygrave . . . . .	Miss Leane . . . . .	Mary Gresh . . . . .	Miss Julia Matthews . . . . .

Doors open at Seven, to commence at Half-past Seven.

PRICES OF ADMISSION: Dress Circle, 5s.; Stalls, 3s.; Boxes, 2s.; Pit, 1s.

The Box Office will be open on the Saturday previous to and on the day of performance, from 11 to 3 o'clock.

2s. No seats reserved after the rising of the curtain.

J. B. PHILP, Hon. Sec.

Theatre

July 1977
Volume 2 Number 3

Australia

- |                        |    |   |
|------------------------|----|---|
| Departments     | 2  | Comment                                     |
|                        | 3  | Quizzes and Quizzes                         |
|                        | 17 | Guild: Theatre, Opera, Dance                |
|                        | 5  | Letters                                     |
|                        | 24 | Wingspan, Runways and Frolics               |
|                        | 44 | International Theatre Institute             |
| Features        | 8  | Vaudeville Follies                          |
|                        |    | Peter Kenna on the 'good old days'          |
|                        | 14 | The Heartland the Heart                     |
|                        |    | John Gaden talks to Robert Page             |
|                        | 17 | The Tasmanian Puppet Theatre                |
|                        |    | Lauri Thompson                              |
|                        | 22 | The Herald                                  |
|                        | 29 | The Playwright's Conscience                 |
|                        |    | Richard Wherrell reports                    |
|                        | 58 | The Phantom Problem                         |
|                        |    | David Marr on the Elizabethan Theatre Trust |
|                        | 57 | Post-Cyclone Theatre                        |
|                        |    | Darwin theatre after Tracy                  |
|                        | 70 | The Crystal Palace                          |
|                        |    | New life for Perth theatre                  |
| Playscripts     | 35 | The Fall Guy: Act Two                       |
|                        | 42 | Mark Rudge's Director's Cookbook            |
| International   | 66 | U.S.A.                                      |
| Studyguide      | 68 | Don Reid on Peter Kenna's A Word God |
| Theatre Reviews | 38 | New South Wales                             |
|                        |    | Going Bananas                        |
|                        |    | The Caliban                          |
|                        |    | Manche                               |
|                        |    | A Chance Love                        |
|                        |    | Unrepentable Acts                    |
|                        |    | Puppets and Paragliders              |
|                        | 13 | A.C.T.                                      |
|                        |    | Three Sisters                        |
|                        |    | Amputation                           |
|                        | 47 | Queensland                                  |
|                        |    | The Last of the Knickerbockers       |
|                        |    | Abigail and Heloise                  |
|                        | 49 | Western Australia                           |
|                        |    | Tremulous                            |
|                        |    | Observed: Exposed                    |
|                        | 51 | Victoria                                    |
|                        |    | The Club                             |
|                        |    | Forewings: News                      |
|                        |    | The Internment Oscar Wilde           |
|                        | 54 | South Australia                             |
|                        |    | Four Plays                           |
|                        |    | Just Back                            |
|                        |    | All My Sons                          |
| Ballet          | 41 | William Shookbridge                         |
| Opera           | 73 | David Goggin                                |
| Film            | 72 | Elizabeth Riddell                           |
| Records         | 75 | Roger Correll                               |
| Books           | 62 | Hein van der Poorten                        |
|                        |    | Raymond Smalley                             |

Theatre Nostalgia

left: A theatre handbill of 1863 promises a night of divers theatrical pleasures.

COMMENT

The two biggest events film have in this place in the theatre world of last and the night, start and starting production of A Chinese Love, and the annual Australian National Playwrights' Conference, where new writers have the chance to assess and work on their plays in workshop with top actors and directors. One of the attractions about two things have in common is the enthusiasm they have given like ANPC over five years and are going to the theatre of this country.

A Chinese Love has had one of the most enthusiastic press responses of any musical for years. Through the musical community only wonder where the glittering costumes were for the first hour and a bit, and the musicals may complain about the scenery. Many, there is no doubt about it, they've done it. Australian dramas have made a show in production in any in the world they dancing a musical — despite criticism for May removes the of music they if ever be able to cope with such complex business choreography. The greatest disadvantage of all, though, is perhaps the fact that highly and freedom are willing to risk hundreds of thousands of dollars on bringing the show which has assumed would most importance to Australia with an Australian cast. Referring to the theatre can result in threat failure or missing innovation, without it there is only one reduction. Because of their success musical theatre here may flourish once more.

Indigenous musical theatre received a reputation, perhaps at the ANPC in the form of Tom Cook's Rock on, a rock opera about the trouble of the Australian rock generation in the South Gap, the place that dropped the bomb on Henderson. Robin Bellamy, Jacki Weaver, Kim McQuinn and Chris Hayward sang, danced and acted their way through the past, moving and developing the audience into without us, common or matter. It is the ability to give us access to the sort of original Australian work that makes the conference a major force in the theatre. This year the Australian Council launched back any funding for it at all in the first application, and after which permission gave a small amount later. The ANPC should, and would like, apparently to be entirely self-sufficient, but what such time as it can be, it must ensure funding is a self-sufficient unit institution.

The conference has probably at least broken over the past — thanks in part to the success and efficient administration of Bill Skene of the Old Tote — and the support it has received from many sources has encouraged the community to work towards the ANPC becoming a permanent and year-round business, as well as the annual meetings working for playwrights, perhaps in a writers' agency, with foreign companies and for new Australian drama, at whatever may be. It has started to do this by making several proposals along these lines, for which it will be lobbying with the appropriate people.

Several of the mechanisms made by the professionals and observers attending, related to change the theatre themselves could hold on for a few all worked together, rather than seeing each other only in terms of rivalry. The setting up of a fund for writers, in future workshops of new Australian work, from such that is paying in two per cent royalties on all out-of-copyright writers. It was also suggested that they band together and agree only to pay a five per cent royalty rate for all overseas plays, though a vote in particular was asking a great deal more, and if anyone should be receiving high royalties it is Australian writers who will not be taking the money out of the industry. Again on the subject of exports, it was agreed that the conference should risk all theatre companies to reduce their bringing in of certain directors and actors in one main visit, and risk the Australian Council and other funding bodies not to finance the travel of imported directors and performers. In addition to these recommendations the funding agency will be asked to guarantee a year by amount they will have to be paid to produce Australian plays.

An address to the conference this year was a film and TV school working at the advice of the local TV station. This appeared to be successful, but had problems negotiating with the financial side of the operation. Perhaps this is symptomatic of the industry in general, and the conclusions passed on the matter was that TV and film producers should try to cut directors from the best theatre and vice versa to its courage cross-fertilisation between the two media. There was a strong feeling, too, that regional TV stations should be encouraged to make drama locally, and could be helped a lot by their community theatre friends. Richard Wootton gave the artistic director's report of the 1977 conference.

A good many theatre critics attended the last weekend of the Playwrights' Conference and one of the most discussed was that of importance in review and how far it could be reliable, arising from the questionnaire which now appears in the Letters page.

Jacki Weaver (just this month's cover) says what she thinks the ANPC does for Australian drama, and award winner (Basil Hayes, NSW) John Gidley explains why he is necessary to leave Australia for a time and return to work that he himself.

As the National Professional Theatre Award winner for 1976 following their announcement at the end of May in Canberra, appear on page 15. Were they the ones you picked?

Theatre Australia

Editor Robert Page
Executive Editor John Wagner
Assistant Editor Bruce Rappaport
Assistant Joyce Farrell

Advisory Board

John Bell, Graham Blustein, Eliza Brown, Katherine Burnham, Yvonne Chelvan, Gordon Chinn, Julia Clarke, W. A. Kinsley, Lydia Gray, Jack Hildred, Ken Marks, Garrie Huddleston, Robert Jenkins, Philip Mason, Alan Marks, John Newby, Paul Hayes, Raymond O'Connor, Philip Parsons, Don Sharp, Ken Scoble, Raymond Staley, Elizabeth Swinburn, John Taplin, Tony Trinch, Graham Worley, Richard Wootton

Editor John Curran
Art Director Alex Scott
Production Editor Peter Miller

Correspondents

Sydney, Don Manger (02) 458 2866
Melbourne, Raymond Staley (03) 419 1204
Brisbane, Don Manger (07) 366 5033
Perth, Joan Anderson (08) 84 1618
Adelaide, Michael Morley (08) 375 2304

Theatre Australia gratefully acknowledges the financial assistance of the Australian Council, the Literature Board of the Australian Council, the New South Wales Culture of Grants Board, the Arts Grants Advisory Committee of South Australia, the Queensland Council Against Censorship, the Victorian Ministry of the Arts, the University of New South Wales Drama Foundation and the Assistance of the University of Newcastle.

Manuscripts

Manuscripts and editorial correspondence should be forwarded to the editorial office, 5 Pennington Place, New London Heights, New South Wales 2205 (telephone (085) 31 3935). While every care is taken of manuscripts and visual material supplied for the magazine, the publisher and their agents accept no liability for loss or damage which may occur. Unrehearsed photographs and visual material will not be returned, unless accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. Opinions expressed in or quoted within are not necessarily those of the editors.

Subscriptions and advertising

The subscription rate is $45.00 post free within Australia. Cheques should be made payable to Theatre Australia and posted to the publisher's address.

For advertising information contact the publisher in Melbourne (03) 43 0343 or Don Manger in Sydney (02) 458 2866.

Theatre Australia is published monthly by Playhouse Press Pty Ltd, 118 Cranford Street, Richmond, Victoria 3121. Distributed by subscription and through theatre agents by Playhouse Press, and to newsagents throughout Australia by Gordon and Scotch (Austral) Ltd, MELBOURNE SYDNEY. Set by Able-Pressing Pty Ltd, and printed by Norman J. Field & Co Pty Ltd, 118 Cranford Street, Richmond 3121. © Playhouse Press Pty Ltd 1977. All rights reserved except where specified. The cover price is maximum recommended retail price only. Registered for posting as a periodical — category C.

“QUOTES & QUERIES”

SYMPATHY ESTABLISHED

JANE WRAY, actress: “I don’t see what John Osborne says the Playwrights’ Conference is worth — it can’t help but be valuable for all concerned — writers obviously, but actors, directors and observers too. I think something I’ve gained from it is sympathy. I’ve talked to a lot of people whose I otherwise agree would. It’s a great leveller: with everyone being together for two weeks in the university hall. It has suddenly made the real me, too, that people like Richard [Wyndham] and myself have become establishment figures, and younger writers and directors are talking to us in the same disabused way as we used to to actors.”

“The year been in the business 15 years — since I was 15 — and I’ve never been out of work or had to get another job. I am myself acting always. I don’t want to direct. And if I have to work, and I always have had to, that’s the best thing for me.”

“The next thing in, of course, Flare Stakes at the Time, which is a wonderful play. I’ve never wanted to play one of the sisters, never felt I’m the type, but but what is so awful. I will have to understand her, feel for her, and make her audience very subtle — probably lots of people in the audience will be just like her.”

WE’LL DO IT

GERALD BLENDLE, Mojo Productions: “We open on 1 July with Benjamin Franklin which should provide us with some starting capital. At the same time we’re going to start a late-night show, the new Heatbeat (sic) (sic) Williams’s play, Passcock & Earl Wolf Moon, and establish a theatre, perhaps with Four Corners. We hope to get on Rosita Hartman’s play Devon Girl, which I was very impressed with at the Playwrights’ Conference. We have backing from the Victorian Arts Ministry for the venue, three years’ lease at Melbourne Playhouse Theatre, and applications in everywhere for further money grants.”

“We plan, too, to be doing regular workshop readings along the lines of the Playwrights’ Conference, as a two-weekly event for the public. The Age newspaper may be coming in on this. Other things will be movie performances, theatre music at off-times, performances of Berg or Beethoven/Wendy songs, satirical review late at night, changing statistics and writers’ commentary. And children’s theatre. You name it.”

WIDER AUDIENCES FOR WORKSHOPS

VICTOR EMILIANOW, Booth Pardon Theatre: “It seems a good idea that the work done at the National Playwrights’ Conference should be seen by an audience outside the confines of the conference who would be made aware of the latest trends in Australian playwriting.”

“The Booth Pardon Theatre will act as the host for a number of the plays workshoped at the conference for a short demonstration season beginning in late June. As many of the original casts are available will be used. Details will be widely publicized.”

DON’T MAKE WAVES, MATE

John Tucker will be directing Don’t Public Against the Wind, Mate by Kenneth Ross, going on at June Street, Sydney, in July. The play was workshoped at the Playwrights’ Conference and had a short run at the Space, Adelaide, in June.

JOHN TUCKER: “The myth of Australia as a land of rugged individualism is a long one dying deep to everyday proof that this country is so far from a degree where individualism, the reformist, and even the economic is viewed with hostile suspicion.”

“In Don’t Public Against the Wind, Mate, the protagonists’ refusal to pay a union vocal levy is simply a catalyst setting his fellow-workers and family against a man who insists on making his own decisions on his own life.”

“To see this play as about ‘workers’ is to evade the major issues. Kenneth Ross has raised AI firm reading, the union-busting aspect struck me most — I think all directors and actors tend to see the problems of a play first — but, on re-reading, I find it is an important play, as it is dealing with bigger issues than any Australian playwright has tackled recently.”

“It is the individual against society, it questions marriage and the family structure.”

“The older Australia of the man character is represented with the younger conformers who are trapped in their conformism. They can’t take stands because of the way of life they have been taught to lead, the motto emblazoned on Australia’s coat of arms at present is ‘Don’t Make Waves’. But all the characters are utterly sympathetic. A woman often does have to suffer for her men’s actions — look at actress Wray!”

READIES FOR PERTH

WILTON MORLEY, managing director, Persephone Productions: “What we have actually done is to take on an old (1900-1910) Perth theatre which used to be a cinema where Dorothy Hewitt’s father put on shows. [See “The Crystal Palace Starts a New Life in this town of Theatre Australia”] It is the only alternative commercial venue in Perth, Edgely is still Her Majesty’s to the Government and now it’s being renovated and won’t be ready for two years.”

“Seven Years’ Nine Year and Benjamin Franklin have been whopping successes, among other reasons partly because Salvage, when the Royal stands, is a handy suburb a bit like Balmain in Sydney, and also because my partner is the, Internat, are rock promoters and they can attract a lot of young people (though Benjamin attract young people anyway).”

“Now we find we’re running up against the same problem that J. C. Williamson’s did: the difficulty of keeping the theatre going with shows. Most shows are expensive, and therefore too expensive. If you don’t get one-handers or two-handers, I don’t know what you do. I’m planning to mount some shows at the Regal and then take them on tour. I hope to do that with John Paul George, Range and Don’t Make Waves, in September.”

“I think Perth people would respond very well to that, they’re just like people everywhere, but they always get everything about three years late. Ross’ Brooklyn is also interested in the video and would like to bring over anything suitable he has.

FRAM DIVERSIFICATION

JOHN THORP, Australian Performing Group: "We see it as diversification of the product — very much the kind of thing that was talked about in the Industries Assistance Commission report. We're hoping for a wider audience for theatre music, or rock music, which is what Songs for Sinner is."

"We've taken an aggressive stand as the contrast of their record enclosed under the label APO Records on 6 June, and so we'll get a much better return than the usual five per cent royalties. We are taking a financial risk, but the response so far has been very good."

"That's just a start. Also in the sound field we're doing a radio series called Downside Counterpoint for ABC and a High Power Show for them too. I don't know what else will come out of that in the way of records or whatever."

"We're making a film of Donkards, and are negotiating with two TV channels about a national series of The Riffs; we have to decide who will do it best — the product has to be really good in a competition of maximizing response and audience."

DEADEND?

MIKE MORRIS, director (who has recently returned to Perth from the Elia Film Drama School in London and is now temporarily lecturing at WAIT): "New York was disastrously alive. I saw some very interesting, excellent new work by new young directors and writers — especially the work of two writers, David Rabe and Chris Duvall. During that latter, coal and shiny play on the theme of the Vietnamisation of New Jersey. So alive."

"But London — sad, dead. Nothing new. I include The Royal Court. The New End is moribund. The only vitality there is in the work of various ensemble players. The much-vaunted new National was as boring as hell, a race building, but otherwise boring."

"I'm convinced that small companies and the development of small community groups is the way theatre is going and the only way it will remain viable in Britain."

ARMIDALE OTHELLO

DENNIS BRADSHAW: "The Armadale Theatre Project sponsored by the Old Time Theatre Company and the Australian Theatre for Young People has been operating since February, although little or no news of its activities has appeared in the media. A fully professional company — six actors, a director and a manager — based in Armidale serves the New England and the NSW North-East region with plays, workshops and seminars."

"If its production of Othello (conceived in May in the Drama Theatre of the University of New England) is anything to go by, the company is doing work of high calibre. With a marvellous cast (two women, five men — one of them manager John Newby) and an almost bare stage (a row wall of grey-painted flats with two doors), director Raymond Oswald achieved an electrifying version of the play noteworthy for its unfashionable virtue and its attention to Shakespeare's verse."

"One hopes that the project will succeed — the company is certainly offering the Armadale region fine professional theatre as part of its share of the cultural subsidy."

WE SOLVE PROBLEMS

CHRISTINE DI NISTON, Stage Consultants: "I've started being Consultants because I've been around for 12 years in a stage producer and director and there has also been an incredible lack in this area. And since J. C. Williamson's left Sydney there has been nowhere even to hire furniture props."

"We will solve any problems, from a phone call about where a particular prop or article can be located, to supplying the set and props for an entire production. We have a pool of 50 technicians in all fields whom I can call on. If sets require building, we will have workshop space and skilled staff on overheads."

"We're starting with very little and building up as the jobs come in. Stage Consultants will also act as an agency for technicians, which is a very new thing in theatre, though there is already one for film people."

"I have worked for the MTC, Newrad, Marine Street, Independent, Alpha Children's Theatre and Canberra Rep, and I hope to be working closely with all the theatre companies."

"Care should be an necessary approach because I've also just spent six months observing staging and lighting techniques in 15 countries, and much of this is quite new to Australia."

"And I'm used to working on all sorts of ranges of budgets."

DESIGNING FOR FRED

WENDY DICKSON, designer (winner of the Best Designer award and art director of The Choir of Jesus Blacksmith): "I haven't actually started working yet, a part from research in my still location hunting."

"We've been driving around New South Wales in the Jerrus Governor area, but we've been rather held up by floods."

"Of course it's very exciting to be working with Fred Schepers on such a major film — and in a huge I think there are 60 locations, it will be shot over 17 weeks with a pretty large cast — many black. It is a period film — 1900 — but not self-consciously so. Fred wants it to be more documentary in style, just cutting in on people's lives."

"In the past I've designed both sets and costumes, which is very taxing, but I hope Frederator will be the costume designer, though we'll work very closely."

"There is a lot of difference between designing for the stage and for film, and I've only recently been able to exploit the difference. The camera seems to film, as, as a designer, you can't make such a complete statement, and you don't have any absolute control over interpretations. Film has to be realistic, but you can be much more detailed."

"Each has its own appeal. I like the containment of working in theatre, and the greater physical size of film. It's really the same relationship with the actors, though perhaps you are more able to design to suit their personalities in film."

WELCOME BACK

ERIK BLACKWORTH, Music Left Theatre Movement: "The Gilera Show Show will be a welcome-back to revue for Gilera Down. She started in revue in 1965 at the Philip Street Theatre — the show was called A Capote Tea, a Revue and a Good Lie Down — and it ran for 14 months between Sydney and Melbourne."

"It's nice that she will be back with William Orger. The show opens at the end of July and will run until January, I think it will be a great success."

EXTRAORDINARY ITEM

DAVID COLVILLE, director of publicity, Australian Opera: "On the second-last page of the Australian Opera's annual report for 1976 a note headed 'Extraordinary item' states that the AO had had to write off $200,000 owed to it by the Australian Council since 1971, which related to a subsidy short fall arising from a change in funding by the council from a financial year ending 30 June to a calendar year basis."

"The Opera has also had to increase expenditure because of reduced funding to the Trust, which has had to retrench 12 members of its opera orchestra."

"We have simply had to take the retrenched members of the orchestra back and add them to our payroll, an extra 12 people to pay throughout the season now at a great deal of money, but we can't possibly allow the drop in artistic standards that would otherwise occur."

CRITICS CRITICISED

The director of the Melbourne Theatre Company, John Sumner, has written to the editor of Theatre Australia Robert Page, questioning the impartiality of some of the journal's critics.

Correspondence between Mr Sumner and Mr Page is published here. A letter from Garrie Hutchence to Mr Sumner is also included. Mr Hutchence is one of the critics Mr Sumner mentioned.

10th May 1977

The Editor,
"Theatre Australia"

Dear Sir,

Your current policy of appointing critics affiliated with particular theatrical companies to assess the productions of rival companies in the same city seems to me an unfair and ethically unsound procedure.

We ask that reviewers of Melbourne Theatre Company productions should be impartial journalists, with no theoretical allegiance, and we look forward to hearing of your future choice in the matter.

Yours faithfully,

John Sumner,

Director,

Melbourne Theatre Company

24th May, 1977

Mr John Sumner,
Director,

Melbourne Theatre Company.

Dear Mr Sumner,

Thank you for your letter of 10th May concerning upon what you interpret, I think wrongly, as our policy in respect of our appointed critics.

We have four critics in Melbourne:

Mr Raymond Straley — theatre writer and journalist (The Stage and Parade); though one not "impartial" but with considerable production, I don't think I do have any dissimile by saying that by and large he is not the A.F.G. way-of-thought.

Ms Suzanne Spunner — theatre critic Melbourne Times and C.A.E. lecturer, I detect a preference for the La Munn style.

Mr Jack Hubbard — according to our information no longer "affiliated" with the A.F.G. A contentious choice, as he is a playwright (some of them lately), and adopts a fairly strident tone when reviewing.

Mr Garrie Hutchence — theatre critic for The Australian (also much other such work), poet, advertising man and part of the management structure of People Productions.

Reviewing theatre, then, I can find only one of our critics to be properly "affiliated" with (a) particular theatre company? That involvement seems so far to have engaged him in the direction of one play at Geelong State. Has this implicit objection to him been noted with The Australian?

On the one hand, I find little evidence (and certainly no intent) of a "current policy" of appointing critics with affiliations to particular theatre companies, and on the other hand, would refuse, in particular cases, to be restricted from the use of people acquainted with, even formerly concerned with, the theatre in a way always solely to employ "impartial journalists".

So far this year Mr Hubbard has reviewed The School for Scandal and The Game of Love and Chance, Mr Hutchence Order Tones and The Fall Guy, Kathleen Beaham The Doll Trilogy, and Mr Straley Love and the Paycock. This I take to be a healthy mix of responses to the M.T.C., and probably more varied than any other theatre company has enjoyed.

Is Mr Edward Merr. Arts Editor of the National Times, to be declared from writing criticism because of his recent production for (and continuing interest in) S.U.D.s which was "commercially" presented at the Seymour Centre? Or is Mr Crumplehorn to be selected for his affiliations (he brings no strips with the Winged, The Time and N.I.D.A.?)

And what of Mr Bushman's affiliations with her stable of writers at Canberra Press? Is arguably Australia's best critic never to lift a pen again because of that?

You refer only to connections with theatre companies but a stronger case may be made about writers, such as Mr Hubbard (and elsewhere Mr Bush, Mr Hewitt, Mr Blair and untold numbers of others who are not so well known), but if such an argument prevailed, then Mr

Radley for one, would have to resign his position as The Age theatre, we are concerned about the possible ethical questions that this might raise and Mr Hubbard (similarly concerned) not to review The Club only if his response is positive, with Mr Hutchence ready to step into the breach if it is not. Why (though this is not your question) ask Mr Hubbard to do a de af? The answer, then, is that criticism are the best judges of other criticism's work. Editors of other criticism's work, publishers of theatre criticism, and stage dog shows, are not impartial writers.

I might add that Steve Gough (writer), Charles Marowitz (writer and director), Alan Seymour (writer and producer) and Brian Kavanagh (theatre producer), to name just a few that spring immediately to mind, were, or have written, for Plato and Plagues.

The argument, then, for finding people with "no theoretical allegiance" seems to me one difficult to implement and what is more, damaging to the standards of theatre criticism and writing in general if it were.

Further, I find your remark in relation to other companies as "forced" at best and at worst potentially offensive. My concern is that implicit in this is the notion of vindictive bias arising through because of vested interest, over honest response. Such an implication would seem to be endorsed by your remark that "our procedure (which I have already deplored as being such)" is "ethically unsound".

I must simply say that our critics are appointed wholly with regard to their ability (in our opinion and relative to others available) to give an in-depth, considered and amiable response to what they see as the theatre. That they take with them certain prejudices is unavoidable but is a part of human nature, not "affiliation".

If there are any specific instances of this letter not being the case, or of bias because of vested interest taking precedence over honest response then I would be pleased to consider them and on such grounds a critic would be dismissed. Otherwise our free policy remains as it is.

Thank you for giving me the opportunity to make that policy clear.

Yours sincerely,

Robert Page,

Editor,

Theatre Australia

LETTERS

Mr Robert Page,
Theatre Australia

Dear Mr Page,

In reply to your letter of 24th May

Our objection to your choice of critics relates to those people directly connected with the management of companies. We do not object to critics in any dual capacity as playwrights, publishers, actors or play directors, providing they have a possible vested interest in the success or failure of the productions they are criticising. Adversely, sometimes this is a delicate field of choice, but a generally impartial viewpoint ought to be the paramount deciding factor, in any case of doubt.

At the time of Jack Hibbard writing the strategies of The School for Scandal and The Game of Love and Chance, he was definitely connected with the running of the Prism Playhouse. We have seen no formal announcement of his having severed his connections with that organisation, in line of this, we must assume that his commitment to the group continues.

Garric Hutchinson likewise, is a falsely connected with the management of Ideopha Productions. Therefore we consider that Garric continuing to act as a critic of other Melbourne companies is unethical. (Yes, we have read the matter with the Editor of The Australian, and his answer has been to appoint another critic.)

Of the six critiques mentioned in your letter, four of them were written by Jack Hibbard and Garric Hutchinson. A fifth was the review of The Bell Trilogy by Katherine Brisbane. As Curseway Pass, with which Miss Brisbane was associated, is shortly to publish the Trilogy, this again seems to us a less than correct choice. (Even though it may be argued to have worked to our advantage.)

What we are asking is that critics deemed to review Melbourne Theatre Company productions should be as clearly non-partisan as possible. We do not regard Jack Hibbard and Garric Hutchinson as being in that category, and we are not prepared to invite either of these critics to make future productions.

Yours sincerely,
John Sumner,
Director,
Melbourne Theatre Company

11th May, 1977

Mr John Sumner,
Director,
Melbourne Theatre Company

Dear John,

I can't say that I am very enthusiastic about the way you have taken it upon yourself to make complicated what was a very straightforward situation. What has resulted from your action is a good deal of confusion from a number of people in the theatre and the press. Your interference in my case has moved them the activities of others, such as Robin, Gifford and Robinson have been being hit in to question, as well as those of yourself. Many people find it difficult to discriminate in principle between a person writing a play for a major company whilst a critic, running a major company whilst being a member of leading organisations, and running a theatre whilst being a critic.

In any event it had been my intention to resign from the Australian on June 30, which information you could have discovered by telephone. I would have hoped we were acquainted sufficiently for you to do so.

On the other hand, I do not intend to cease writing for Theatre Australia, which has a function dissimilar to that of a daily newspaper.

I hope we can maintain the friendly and co-operative relations we had in the time of our session at Grand Street.

Yours sincerely,
GARRIC HUTCHINSON

ANN McDONALD
COLLEGE OF DANCE/NG
(Est. 1926)

Ballet (R.A.D.) Examination to all grades: pre preliminary to solo and Full-time day classes also

Classes and Private Tuition Ballet, Latin American, Old Time, Salsa, Tumbola, Modern, Jazz and Classical

The Greenwood Hall Company
100 Liverpool Road,
Burwood N.S.W. 2134
Phone 76 6182 (A.H. 428 1694)

June 1, 1977

KILLARA 680 COFFEE THEATRE

882 Pacific Highway, Killara, N.S.W.

Proudly Presents

HALLO LONDON

A fun show to celebrate the 10th Anniversary of the Queen in a Silver Jubilee
Tues. Wed Thurs. 8.00 to 10.00 p.m.
Sat. at 2.00 p.m.
Reservations: (02) 455 7562
Excellent Theatre Party Concessions available

Rose Street,
Fremont, Calif.
94536
(415) 794-0626
(415) 794-0666

Small...
But you just can't miss us

MARIAN

THEATRE AND RESTAURANT
488 2180

Harry! Must finish July 8
George's Hayden's Spicy Fennel Fence
THE HAPPY HUNTER
Tuesday to Saturday 8.15, Sunday 4.30
Dinner from 6.30 Tuesday to Saturday
OPENING FRIDAY JULY 15
Barry Loefer, Philip Hines,
Loraine Page, Trevor Keel and Kerry Nelson in COMPLISERS
by Alan Ayckbourn
Directed by Ted Crag
2 MARIAN ST. KILLARA

Give Theatre Australia to a friend.

While you're at it, why not subscribe for yourself?

A subscription to Theatre Australia makes a wonderful gift.

Send $19.00 for each one year's subscription to Playhouse Press Pty Ltd
114 Colman Street Richmond
Victoria 3121. You'll save $3.60 on the cover price.

SORLIE'S

FAMOUS REVUE CO.

Mrs. GRACE SORLIE and HENRY LE BRUN present . . .

★ 3 BIG REVUES ★

"OUT OF THIS WORLD"

"OLYMPIC DAMES" — — "TOPSY TURVY"

MISS GRACE SORLIE
(The Revue)

THE KALIST SYSTEM

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

MR. ARTHUR
(The Revue)

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

THE KALIST SYSTEM

THE KALIST SYSTEM

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

MR. HENRY LE BRUN
(The Revue)

THE KALIST SYSTEM

AT THE MATINEES:
"MOTHER GOOSE"
A DELIGHTFUL PANTOMIME

For Location, Box Plan and Changes of Programme see LOCAL PRESS and RADIO — Popular Prices

Vaudeville Follies

Lo to R: Doreen, Nina, Nola, Pat, Pam & Sue. Sorlie's, 1937.

Peter Kenna tells of some terrifying moments in tent shows and such

The night The Mills Family Show opened at Sydney's Beauds Pavilion Theatre, Winona Hills tore down the premises outside screaming the terrible message that her Gimmey had probably been taken by the waves. Then he had a violent argument with his father in the foyer and disappeared into the lavatory. Later in the evening he was too accused by his sister Antagonist of being a compulsive bed-wetter. She had been dipping in the ocean himself and wasn't able to remove one of her Progressor's flippers. She appeared in the opening number with a flapping grotesquely bearded the smart little high-heeled sandals she wore on her other feet. Of course the orchestra didn't arrive at all and a rather squally Flattery Hills was driven to ensuring the audience was providing the atmosphere of booms, bangs and abba-dabba-dabba to cushion itself.

The Frame Factory was in town giving weight to the number that it is again by the main touring theatre company in Australia.

Not all of the show comes off, mind you, but the rest of the acting is always there to bounce you over the boring bits. A lot of people talk about Ensemble Acting, and many of them think they're doing it, when you see the Frame Factory at work there's no doubt in your mind that, at last, you're watching the real thing.

However, the purpose of this piece is not to quit the show. I've been asked to write about it in relation to real Australian Variety which, as it is expressed in The Mills Family Show, is now, alas, all but dead. But looking back into even our most recent past, one discovers there existed quite a few troupes in The Mills tradition (dapper and more polished, of course, and, thank God, not as disaster-prone, but basically aiming for the same thing to provide alone, family entertainment for simple people whose tastes differed considerably from those of the more blasé capital-city dwellers.

Sorlie's is the name that comes immediately to mind. Until 1966 they travelled the agricultural show route, following the sun in a big tent that could park well over a thousand people under its four-kay-pole spread, never playing on the showground but in the town, because they considered themselves not above the multi-millionaire people. Sorlie was a Negro married to an arresting, very fair woman named Grace. Every performance, she would stand at the entrance to the tent "selling tickets" dressed in a formal evening-gown and wearing drop earrings so heavily encrusted with diamonds they permanently lightened the lobes of her ears. Behind them, painted to the dress, was a smashing diamond brooch in the shape of a crocodile. From time to time, some very famous Australian artists worked for Sorlie's: Peter Finch and Gloria Deane, to name two.

But for a real family show you have to turn to Baynton's Follies. Roy Baynton managed the business side of the venture, but his brother and sister were the show's comedians and comedienne, and his daughter danced. Eventually she married a director, which increased the family's involvement in the evening's entertainment. Also, the Great Levinsky, a very popular dancer, had a show in which his daughter danced. Mack's, Little's, Peter Kenna was born in Belmont, Sydney, in 1935. After a variety of jobs, he decided to become a radio writer. He wrote programmes as a playwright in 1959 with his third play, The Shepherd of Sonnet Forest (a Ray Charles play-in-Gladi). Bill in the Moon, Marion's Fancies, Laurel's Comedy, A Word God and Theorem and The Provençal which have all been produced in Australia.

EXILES

Mrs Grace Sorlie

Columbia's, Cole's the showman is the best operated all over the country. Sometimes they were popped side by side in appearance to each other.

During the last twinkle, my eldest brother, James, worked on a tent house with Roy Bell's troupe. During a "time out" he was walking the roads of the Darling Downs and came upon a small circus and rodeo run by the Clinton brothers and attached himself to them for a while. They played only the minor brands of the area, leaving the good-sized tents (and possibly more critical audiences) to the big concerns such as Ward's and Solo Brothers. On arriving at a place, they would put up their "sides" in circle of houses or canvas without a tent, and then sit down with their musical instruments to do a grand Harry Clinton played a nightman's.

Musical drama, Charlie a clown and Uncle Tom a cornet. The show's down and back-jump order, a half-past-Aboriginal nicknamed Red Harry, seemed on the ground. When the audience did arrive, the pretty, 16-year-old Daphne Clinton was ready at her knock-on-down mood and she and James sold balls and presented boxes of chocolates to the lucky winners until the family was ready to start the show inside. Daphne then joined them as the major attraction. She would fly the trapeze, walk the slack-rope and perform acrobatics posed on the backs of waiting horses while her proud father, the ringmaster, cavorted her talents to the audience.

THE ARTIST

(The Art Show)

Clinton Down's grandparents on her mother's side were circus people too and their daughter, Toots, Gags and Zilla (Gloria's mother) worked with them in various acts. Later the three girls went into Variety at The Weatherly Station. They performed an acrobatic-contestional number wherein Zilla appeared out of a silver wheeled dress as a Frog, Toots appeared as a Fairy and Gags got there somehow as a Crocodile.

But to return to The Hills, the chief delight of that show is in the disasters which lie in wait to trip them up, of being out on. They see the staff of nightmen for all entertainers and you can only laugh about them afterwards because you're so damn glad they're over. Grumpy (Harry Hills), the only real pro in the family, fell out of her wheelchair on to her face mismanaging the show's intermission. Mary, the 13-year-old child prodigy, has her music confused by injury during a piano solo and prevents the audience with a parade of half-minute sketches of nearly every popular classic you can name — some of them played with the music upside down. It was these preordained disasters, and sometimes teaching students, in the show which decided me to ask them a story.

Patrons, Sorlie's, 1953

saved for this article to record their own surviving or pleasurable moment in the theatre.

Gloria Dawn was playing Cinderella in pants once and appeared at the top of the staircase in the ball room scene looking just like Cinderella should look on arriving to meet Prince Charming. She was wearing a costume of soft, flowery frills. When she began to move, she realized something was wrong and correctly surmised that part of her skirt had caught on a nail. However, the rule at "Never look back. Keep smiling. Go forward." She did — and arrived at Prince Charming's side with just the fringe of the cascade and a petticoat on the lower part of her body.

I once saw a production of Cinderella in which the Fairy Godmother appeared in the kitchen (drawing magic about the confetti). A twist of her wand and Cinderella's rags became a glittering ball-dress. She changed the pumpkin into a coach and the mice into footmen. Learning in triumph, she discovered the door was jammed — and she couldn't get out!

Gloria Dawn

Stanley Holloway weighed in with a story about a mistake in the English provinces during the tour of The Casanova. Apparently the cove they were playing had never heard of the show's phenomenal six-year run in the West End. There were exactly a dozen people scattered about the auditorium when they began their opening number. Half way through this, an idiot appeared leading a late-comer down the aisle. "For God's sake," one of the actors shouted at him from the stage, "Don't wait that man! He'll make trouble."

Tharra Rogers, once the mistress in Parlova's company, also appeared in the London production of Max Reinhardt's The Miracle. The interior of the theatre was transformed into a cathedral and all the celebrities were dressed as such. So too were many of the players, of course, including Tharra, who had to make her entrance from the foyer and move down the aisle up on to the stage. At one performance, a late-comer mistook her for an out for someone to rescue him before he falls off his controller's knee, reminded me of two ventriloquist stunts, again told me by my brother James. He once walked the streets of the outback with a cane who carried a doll in his swing and "shewed" wherever he met a group of people. Another ventriloquist he knew appeared in a small tent on the showgrounds. On one occasion, they were playing a far-flung outpost where the children were unused to seeing other white people, let alone a talking doll. One of the children was swinging from the tent's supporting pole and gnawing the ventriloquist's appeal for him not to do so. The act hadn't begun yet and the doll was lying hidden on a table. Suddenly, the man grabbed it and pushed it at the child while it shouted, "If you don't stop swinging on that pole I'll swing from your bloody neck!" The child fell backwards open-mouthed and then began screaming. They could well hear him screaming even after he had reached the security of the air conditioning booth.

Stanley Holloway

And Granny falling out of her shocker reminded me of a story told me by a cousin, Myra Morgan. She was with Coleman's Follies about the same time substitute and followed her blindly until she found herself, dropping silver-ten and trailing crêpe-de-chêne, sleep-bung in the middle of a Medieval celebration, with no idea in the world of how to get out of it. Mr Reinhardt was the inventor of Tout Theatre.

BOBBY LE BRUN

Faurey Hills's ventriloquist act, during which he goes to sleep and the doll comes

VAUDEVILLE FOLLIES

James was with Nell. Her act was an acrobatic while performed in unison with another girl before a frontalists while a scene was being changed. It included a series of "slow dances" which means simply turning over back words continuously supported by your hands. Anyway, one night Myra failed to estimate correctly the space available to her and "slip-trick-kick" herself right off the edge of the stage and into the percussion section of the orchestra.

Queenie Paul clocked in with a much tender moment. She was playing The National in Sydney (now the Mayfair Cinema) for Sir Ben Fuller, who at the same time was about to open the St James (now Donna's). Every show she had been in for him had been a success and so, on the night before the St James was to open, he called her over after her own show to "sing back" into the building. She stood on the bare stage and, wearing an accompanist and with only Sir Ben and a few waiters on in the stalls, she put all her heart and hope into "Cheermeum" for him.

Roscoe Hay, the choreographer and a stalwart of Variety through nearly four decades, remembers staging a Deep South number at the Troika ("My dear, there were Minstrels swarming from the rafters") featuring Irene Hayes and real rain, which was supposed to fall from the flies into a rough frontalists. But a didn't. It rained, and all the "Darkies" were transformed into bedraggled "Whites" before the eyes of a startled audience.

Ray Cook, at present musical-directing at Chorus Line in London, has a whole bag of disaster stories. My favourite is the one about the one-show he was playing piano for which used ultra-violet lights in one of the chambers. You know, things glow in the dark. Well, so do your teeth, so you have to keep your mouth closed while you're singing. One night a shaver turned the wrong way on a production number and they all went down like oranges! Out of nowhere 15 years of screaming teeth manifested!

LUCKY GRILLS (Atomic Comic)

And as for on the stories, go — only lack of space allows me Opera, Ballet, Drama, Variety no one is safe. There is already a crop of disaster stories building up around the club scene. I'll conclude with one of those. It's also the ultimate "Ugly Duck" anecdote.

A while ago a very well-known Negro singer was performing at an RSL club in Sydney before an audience totally unaccustomed to his art. They talked among themselves, showed drunk orders to the waitress and played the poker-machines loudly. He left the stage in some distress, to be followed by a comedian who faced even less well because he was rather noticeably effeminate in manner. They turned their attention to him all right, and chaos ensued. Finally, the club's entertainment officer was forced to run out on to the stage and gesture them with an ultimatum: "Listen, you muckheads," he shouted. "Give the Paul a go or I'll bring the bloody back."

Dummies: Hills Family Show

★ Don't ★ Forget Our Slogan:
IT'S ALWAYS A GOOD SHOW
AT SORLIE'S

'I want to try to sort out where my artistic roots are . . .'

THE HEAD AND THE HEART

John Gaden played Henry Carr for the second time in this year's revival of the famous production of Forrest and his girls. Gaden was chosen to play Carr because of his long experience with the role abroad. Gaden gave Carr a beautiful night, which was enjoyed by most of the cast members of Forrest and his girls.

John Gaden, one of our finest actors, tells Theatre Australia why he has decided to go abroad

Question: Let's start with you, John Gaden, the documentary man.

Gaden: I was brought up in Sydney — Double Bay. I'm 35. Educated in Sydney, Sydney University. I did mostly theatre there, and studied arts and law from 1959 to 1966. It was a very happy time. University drama was going through a terrifically high point, a very active time. SIDS began to produce theatre of the street in Australia. Peter was pioneering there with good productions of The Birthday Party, and others. That's where I got my grounding, and it's been a good and bad thing. A bad thing because for a long time I had quite an over-romantic idea of theatre. I was a little contemptuous of popular culture, which I'm not now. We're a very material society: a lot of people spend their lives getting and spending, especially with the death of the Church, which happened here in a big way towards the end of the 18th, and I think theatre provides that sort of community experience now. People can come into a theatre from their three bedrooms and two cars and laugh or cry at something that doesn't normally touch them.

Q: Would you actually consider the use of the theatre with the fall of the Church?

Gaden: No, but it's an interesting thought! It's significant that a lot of our best theatre people had a strong Catholic upbringing: John Bell, Peter Carroll, Noel Fitzpatrick, Rex Blair, Peter Kenna. . . John was very devout at university — not that I mean his acting and directing styles are Catholic! But there is something about what the Church gave people, a life beyond the getting-and-spending one, and a sense of theatre I suppose. We seem to need that in a group, and TV can never quite do that, as it's a more private experience while theatre is communal.

Q: Were you religious?

Gaden: Yes, very.

Q: And now?

Gaden: No, I suppose I'm agnostic really. I don't know, and I doubt strongly, but said I was 17 I was deeply religious.

Q: Mosaic Theatre started in 1971 with a lot of people who were all at the university together, went their separate ways and came back together. What did you do in the intervening five years?

Gaden: I got into the business. John Tinker, who was the director of the South Australian Theatre Company, had applied for people to come for the Young Elizabethan tour. Peter Butler, who'd been at university with me, was the classical music arranger for the ABC and happened to be looking over Tinker's shoulder as he was looking at my photograph. And Peter said, "That's John Gaden, I've seen him in things at the university — he's good." So I got the job. Everything's set on from there. I did two Young Elizabethan tours around South Australia, worked for six months at Theatre 62 where John Edmondson was running it, playing old heads, including Lear — the full lot — which was an amazing way to work. Then a NSW tour playing a dragon, six months at St Martin's, Melbourne, when it was run by Irene Mitchell, and when I first worked with Barbara Stephens I met Sandy [McGowan] there, too, whom I lived with — and have just stopped living with — for six years. They didn't pay rehearsal money in those days, when I arrived, I was living in a tiny flat in North Carlton and I had literally no money. I had to walk from North Carlton to St Martin's, which was right the other side of town, and back every day, and work in a six-week before and after hours. A very character-building time!

Q: You must have been very convinced that the business was going to be good to you?

Gaden: I suppose I was, though I honestly never thought of it in those terms. You know you've got a career talent, but I just wanted to work in those days. I've worked almost continuously since I went into the business, a lot of it's been with Ed rather than him doing, but I've never stopped.

It was then that I went to Perth and joined a company. Anne Neeson had formed in the Octagon Theatre on the university campus. At the end of that time, Gaden came to Perth, he'd been out here doing Onepara in Sydney and All's Well in Melbourne, and he came because he had an association with the Odeons, which he'd helped to design. He did three one-week readings, The Power of God, The Wake of History and The Palace of Love. He played the Voice of God, of course, which was wonderful. I was in The Palace of History, and we really hit it off. It really wasn't an overwhelming situation, I just fell in love with him, I think. And I think it was he who got me placed in Godfather when it went on tour — I took over as Chorus Leader.

From then, I went into The Crucible at Praeger, for the Tote, joined the Tote Company at the Parade and stayed with them till 1974-75 through into the Opera House period. It was a good company. We worked hard and did a lot of plays: Richard III at the Opera House, Love for Love, Bill Gaskill's version of Love's Labour's Lost, a new play by Michael Boddy called Crucible of Worcester, and back at the Tote, John's [John Bell's] productions of The Good Woman of Setzuan, How Could you Believe me When I Said I'd Be your Father when you know I've done a Lie all my Life? [Tara's] The Tempest of the Shrew, George Ogilvie's Young Periwinkle of the Walls, and so it goes on. An amazingly busy time. I did odd things for the MTC, like the Lavender play The Man who Shot the Archbishop, with Frank Thring and Lee McKinn — that was a pretty bad experience — which really led up to the period of going back to Nimrod.

First I went to Melbourne for the six-month voice course with Rowena Below. Just to November 1975. That was a big turning-point for me, I decided to do the course because I didn't know that I wanted to go on being an actor. Certainly I didn't want to go on being an actor in Australia — not because I felt better, but because I didn't feel stretched any more. The course with Rowena stretched me. It was hard work, five days a week, 10 till five. Long and often frustrating, but I came out of it feeling really excited. I felt I had somewhere to go for the rest of my career at theatre.

Q: You touch it now, don't you?

Gaskin: Yes. Sometimes with, sometimes not so well. It's basically a method of voice production, not just speech education, but where the impulse for a sound comes from, how it gets out of the body, how we organize it, orchestrate it, or don't, in letting it go. It has a good deal to do with the kind of actor who can just be, rather than represent, so it's directly geared to the Method and Stanislavsky, though not consciously so. The basic technical source involves using energy normally put into tension in other areas, both the release of sound and the physical being and experiencing on stage. It doesn't suit everyone, but it suited me as a very tense person and a very tense actor. I went straight out of that and into Twentieth, and I don't think I could have done anything better, as it required me to come immediately into contact with difficult areas of the work, which do you do with plays that a non-year-old nonacademic? I feel Twentieth was a great step forward for me.

Q: In the 18 months you've been at Nimrod you've done in some sense to epitomize the best of the Nimrod style. Were you happier there than at the Tote? Gaskin: I've certainly been happy at Nimrod — because I've been playing some pretty nice roles — not that that always makes me happy. And because I like working continuously, although I have learned now that I'm going to have to start cutting down because I've found, whether it's a phenomenon of old age or a greater amount of input to a production, that I can't maintain the workload and thus pace, performing and rehearsing at the same time. When I came to start work on Young Mc I felt, "I'm so fucked I have no energy to put into that. I can't work." And it was only in the third week that I passed the panic button and came up with some ideas. I don't like working that way, and it was a lesson to me. I've got to start pacing and spacing myself a little more. I think the more experience you get the harder it gets, harder to make your choices and decisions.

While, like anyone in any organization, I have my criticisms of Nimrod, I want to continue working there because I think it's a theatre that, because of its financial structure, size limitations and lack of sufficient subsidy, cannot get away with top-py presentation. They have to rely on innovation and the quality of the productions to get by on no state. I think that the more established theatre companies like the Tote and the MTC are getting into areas where they are catering to their subscribers, and there's nothing particularly wrong with that except that it doesn't seem very exciting or revealing. Candidates for actors are better, but I think what has been lost is that immediate need to get audience.

Q: So Nimrod's at the lights and the Tote and the MTC in the safety net?

Gaskin: Much more at the lights, and you feel it there as an actor. I'm very much concerned with how many people are in every night. I'm also very concerned about the fact that I think our seasonal periods there are a week too short in every slot, but I understand why they have to be. Ultimately I'm convinced that a good theatre operates on personal merit.

Q: What about those Poms coming over?

Gaskin: I think it has to be drawn, but it's very hard to know where. Stuff like Dead End! Dead End! looks second-rate pieces being dropped in to the public. We're invited as a place for out-of-work British actors to come and make a little money, and they take that money away and do nothing for the theatre. The Trust say they only offer management services, but I know people who've approached them for these services for local productions, and been refused. Why isn't the Royal being filled with the local product — commercial strings for the Nimrod March, A Handful of Friends, Old Tote Melbourne?

Q: The Trust apparently lost money on Ed Norton.

Gaskin: Losing money's a great pity, but I would have thought that, according to their charter, they're not primarily a money-making concern. Of course, if there's no money they can't promote theatre, but there's no evidence that they're making a planned — and I mean planned — investment in Australian theatre.

We may have things like the RSC, Grotowski, Marcel Marceau because drama is an international as much as a national thing. It's important to see what other countries are doing because it's a slightly altered state of consciousness. Personally I don't want The Pleasure of Mr. Campbell, but there's a hell of a lot of people who do, and who am I to say they shouldn't have it?

Q: Should the last, then, be qualitative or quantitative?

Gaskin: It's a confusing area. My immediate concern is. Look how much imported stuff is coming out here. It doesn't look to be of very high quality, but again who am I to say that? I look at drawing a qualitative line, but at a time when theatre is languishing in Australia, we're not going to reveal that is wrong by saying we can't do this, but someone people can.

There's also the problem far as our love of having our heads in the Old World and our hearts in the New World. We're caught up in that bad by tradition, as theatre we're traditionally in the Old World of English rep and the English literary tradition from the basic sources of Shakespeare right through the canon of English drama. I am fifth-generation Australian, yet what turned me on to theatre was not Summer of the Seventeenth Doll or Love From, but Chekhov, Brechtian drama, Janice, Marlowe, Ramona and Timberlane particularly were the things that made me want to become an actor. I've run into a terrible problem with seeing or doing Shakespeare in Australia because, well, at the moment, it's always like a foreign language. The big risk in making it accessible (as John did so well with Black Swan) is that you often make it colloquial and lose the spirit, and I have felt that we've been doing a pale shadow of the plays. Awake and Fearful remains even if we've been doing them unjust.

We're still a colonial country, perhaps the last in the world, whether we like it or not, and we think that if a canon from elsewhere by the people who "know", that's better. The colonial cringe exists through all the subtleties of the arts, and it certainly exists in me. That's one reason why I want to go away and look at it. But we shouldn't encourage people when we know that the work we're seeing is often inferior drama. It may be lightly entertaining, but you must get priorities right and therefore top priority is what it can do. Light entertainment is done better by TV, the only way we're going to improve is to keep pushing the boundaries of what we can do. We're certainly not going to survive as light entertainment, and not should we hope to.

Q: You could argue that David Williamson's plays have little concern for the screen-audience relationship, that Hugo and Williamson are stuck in the picture-frame theatre, and that that could be better done on TV.

Gordon: It couldn't because it's too embarrassing. One of the strengths of David's work is a good straight to people's gaze. That's why they laugh a lot. Williamson and Hugo are engaging — not in the same way as Travesties or Young Mr. Pitt but in one of the other functions of theatre, that of presenting people face to face. That's why David's plays are always so comically theatrical, he dares on stage to explore situations which are embarrassing and confront. I don't think you ever knew one of his plays feeling comfortable. They seem to generate a lot of social discussion about who we are, what we're like, who the middle class is, what our hopes and aspirations are. What our spirit really is.

Q: He's on the absolute forefront of social thinking and the theatrical art in a combination and very intense.

Gordon: Yes, and by and large I don't think TV can do that. One of the things I heard Offshore drop in an interview — he'd been asked "Why theatre in this age of mass communication?", he said, "Because theatre has a sense of occasion", which is why there may be more in the theatre, or mass, weeping, mass laughter. I think David's and other Australian plays have that quality, so I wouldn't say for a moment they were just as suitable to film or TV.

Q: You are very much a theatre actor. Why is that?

Gordon: I'm, probably more by accident than design. Partly because I need, and have wanted, to keep working, and theatre offers me continuity of work. I'm not good at free-lancing, I get deeply depressed and list, and I continuously need theatre. And that continuity of work as theatre has largely prevented me from hanging out for work in film and TV. If I want to break into that area it means I'm going to have to take time off to do it. An actor like Johnny Hopkins, who is now becoming a film actor, spends a half of a lot of time on the dock, and it's one of the few ways of ensuring he will get film parts — being available. I was offered work in Picture Show, Mis and things like that, but I couldn't do it. It goes back to Between Women. I was offered the part that Arthur finally played, but I couldn't do it because I was in contract to the Tote for Tu Pity Sir's a Hoax. Now, had I been free to do that, I might have taken a different direction. I probably would have, but I'm not later or sorry about that. Of course, I'd like to work in film, particularly film, and I guess I will do one day.

Q: The star system. You've become a name, most people will go to a show because you are in it. What about the Australian star system? Do you think it would help?

Gordon: We couldn't have the Hollywood star system here where people could be created by a huge PR machine, because here, if you're going to be a star in theatre, you have to deliver the goods, and not just once but all the time. Here you're as good as you're last production.

Q: You're more exposed here?

Gordon: Yes. I believe in a star system because I believe there are some people who can deliver the goods all the time, and people will want to come and see them, so of course a star system begins to happen. But I also believe very firmly that a theatre that operates by saying, "We'll get X, Y or Z, they're big names, so it'll be all right" — that's been shown time and time again not to work.

Q: Is there anything in the Australian character against a star system, with phrases like "pussy-licking" looked about?

Gordon: I frankly don't believe that. Who are the Australian stars you can think of of the top of your head? John, Meg, Livermore, Betty Humphries, Frank Thring? They'll all have their detractors, but they have an enormous following, and they have it because they deliver the goods. People will very quickly snap if you have a failure, but I think they will anywhere. I don't feel we're less tolerant to failure than anyone else. You build up a relationship with an audience, I feel I have with the Marnock audience.

Q: Do you want to make a comeback — to act on stage?

Gordon: Of course I would love to work in England. But, you see, making it — and I really think I'm being honest about that — in terms of success money, none, has never been all that important to me. It's important to me only because I've entered into bigger and better roles. If you're working at the top, you can work with better people, better directors. But I do not want the big-money status, the money and the cars. I don't even want a place in history, however minor. But I certainly want to keep working and success is the best way to do it.

Q: There's a sort of branding to John Gordon, and you're always an obviously hard-working actor. How far do you depend on technique?

Gordon: I find it very hard to work in any other way than in full speech, which means involving myself totally. Sometimes I go on to an audience and realise the laughs have been coming in for the last five minutes but I won't notice. That's a phenomenon of loneliness, and I don't like it, which is why I've got to cut down the load a little bit. I would like, and I think I'm becoming, as an actor, more a vagrant and less pleading with an audience. Quite often the lack of the right kind of arrogance can make one too involved with presentation and not enough involved with oneself on stage. I certainly don't want to be arrogant in the sense of being contemptuous of an audience. The honesty's important.

Q: How much do you take out of yourself in acting?

Gordon: The more I work, the more for me I realise that I have to use myself. Whatever moves through me, and however it transforms me, is the movement. Though I wouldn't describe myself as a Method actor, I think all good acting has very much to do with the Method. Stanislavsky was only taking what he thought to be good acting and analysing it. But it does myself more and more, so it's very important to me what kind of person I am — how the state of my conscience is, where I live, how I behave. It's important to know where I'm at as an actor and a person — and the two I find increasingly inseparable. So this conflict I mentioned about the head and the heart has become a very big one, and is one some who, I'm going away, probably the main one. I want to try to sort out where my artistic roots are because I feel that only when I get my head and my heart totally together can I really act.

Q: Going away is an enormous leap into the unknown. You've got work, lead roles here, so why leave now?

Gordon: It's the need to step for a time, I find. I work apocalyptically. The last cycle stemmed from the Romans Belos course in Melbourne, now there's another one beginning. I work in great bursts of energy and then I find I need to step and rest and re-evaluate. I need distance sometimes. I also feel it's no good talking and thinking about the British, American and Polish theatre, I must go and see them and sort them out for myself. The fact of going is frightening because I've never travelled. When Narnock decided to give me this beautiful night, I was absolutely knocked out, you know you have friends, but I didn't know what people really felt about me — and that's been almost too much. I do get a bit weepy every now and then. I think, "Why am I going away and leaving all this?" Well, I'm coming back. The benefit has brought together a whole lot of ideas and feelings about being in Australia which have never been so strong before. It's certainly going to make it very difficult to stay away for any time. Which is perhaps a good thing! ■

Preview of an 'adult' production in the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre's new home

Leah Thompson

SIX PUPPETS IN SEARCH OF A GENRE

THE TROPICAN is a small, tucked-away building in Hobart, Tasmania, tucked away from the city's main thoroughfares. It is a small, tucked-away building, but it is a building that has become a home for the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre.

It is a small, tucked-away building, but it is a building that has become a home for the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre. It is a small, tucked-away building, but it is a building that has become a home for the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre.

If we could cross Europe with Trojan Town, F. T. Marwick and Georg Kaiser, we would probably end up with someone like Nigel Triffin. Toss this marvellous mixture home in the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre's new warehouse and theatre, and the result would be Moore's, an almost perfect of six puppets in search of a genre. A new genre is what Moore's is all about. It didn't happen overnight and it has a long way to go before it becomes established as a major movement, but it's here and it deserves notice.

I accepted the invitation to review Moore's with a liberal amount of apprehension, it was billed as an adult puppet show (whatever that is). I expected some sort of cross-fertilisation between America Murch and Oh, Calcutta. My present interest was once more aroused when I arrived at the theatre. The Tasmanian Puppet Theatre is located in Salamanca Place, a history of warehouses near Hobart's Constitution Dock. I had to enter the theatre through a small opening in a large corrugated-iron door. Inside, I was told I would be viewing a private performance and under no circumstances was I to use the toilets — they hadn't been completed. The foyer of the theatre is on the first floor and takes up nearly half the building. There were several other guests wandering around. Somehow they didn't look the type that would take a puppet delight in puppetry. After the traditional token glass of wine, we were ushered into the theatre and it was a theatre — as the lights came on, not the puppet scene.

I settled into my seat and relaxed. It was a near-perfect little theatre, intimate, but not claustrophobic. I was pleased for my friend Peter Wilson, artistic director and founder of the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre. He has been waiting for a long time for a theatre of his own. For more than seven years, he and his complement of puppets and puppeteers have danced from one end of Tasmania to the other, playing in overcrowded school-rooms and over-sunbaked halls. Peter began his career performing one-man shows, and when he joined the Puppet Theatre, he was viewed as something of an upset, growing about an idea, insisting that there was more to puppetry than "kiddie's entertainment". He has at least achieved some poetic justice by opening his new premises with a programme orientated towards adults.

The Old People from Moore's

Moorens

Left-handedly Peter is indebted to the Marionette Theatre of Australia for his success. From the time he opened his first major production, Hamlet and Gertrude in 1971, there was always someone who would hold up the name of Peter Scriver's Puppetry for comparison. In those early days the Marionette Theatre of Australia had Peter Scriver's reputation and the assured financial and ideological support of the Elmhurst Theatre Trust. Peter Wilson had a small grant, a part-time job and lots of guts. In 1973, Peter was awarded a Churchill Fellowship which provided him with the opportunity to study the techniques of puppetry in Japan, Russia, Czechoslovakia, Germany, England and the United States. The influence of this tour on Peter's work is clearly shown by the veritable menagerie of puppets that hang from the walls and ceiling of the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre's new second-floor workshop, a most testimony to 12 major productions and countless minor ones. The spectre may still be behind Peter, but he hasn't had the time or inclination to look back. He has been too busy turning an old oil-pocket dream into a company that now employs a business administrator and eight full-time puppeteers. For myself, after having seen a performance of Moorens, I find it difficult to believe that the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre could be over-shadowed by any company.

Moorens is, in every sense an integrated production. The set, designed by Jennifer Davidson, not only creates the atmosphere, it takes an active part in the performance. The stage is dominated by an 11-foot circular disc that rotates during the show. One side of the disc is a large, animated caricature of a woman's face surrounded by an array of coloured circus glasses. Above the disc, on the next floor, the ceiling has been removed, so an in-

Left: Moorens
"A sort of scope of illusion"

Alby the Albatross and his operator from Rob A Dab Dab

Spav from
Kash Aa Dush Dush

vented puppeteer used as an acting area for a puppeteer-in-suspense, a Chaudhary figure in a bowler hat who seems to exert control over the performance below. Behind him was a large fleshy red face that opened to reveal a midget-wheel of red and white fluorescent lights that gave way when he made too fast. The upper stage seemed barrowed is the only word that can be used, as there is no dialogue or plot to represent a conscious world, a rough, baroque life that antedated the sensitive, intellectual world that occupied the lower stage. Four gleaming, alienation leaders quadrant the two floors and were used by the performers for entrances and exits.

The show is a cosmogony of illusion. Props and set-pieces appear and disappear, curtain shades descend from above and rise from the floor and become animated to make a passing comment, a table is set for two and a room appears. The massive face on the disc betches smoke and her great mouth opens to become the showcase for a carnival night-club show. There is even a traditional Punjabi and lady, shown with a scowling ending and multifarious symbolic cut-outs, all combining to make an apocalyptic visual collage. The show has a typical Triffinian about it, an over-indulgent involvement with Dada and the Futurists and the refusal to make a precise connection. But the show is not a badge-pledge, all the pieces fit, adhered by a well-disciplined technique.

The action centres around a faceless, child-size figure removed from a region in the centre of the stage and controlled by three puppeteers dressed in black velvet. All the puppeteers were dressed alike, more for dignity than disguise, as they often bared their faces. Seemingly to float in the air, the faceless child recreates a symbolic journey of birth and discovery while being observed and sometimes assessed by elements of the baroque life on the stage show. The ordeal becomes too much for her, and she eventually expires and is about to be given up to oblivion when her limp body is retrieved by a giant, grotesque bag-like creature that tentatively straps

Above:
Tabesh Hoshina, guest director of Big Noise, left

out of the darkness. The bag is joined by five other creatures of equal size (well over seven feet!), who prod and surround the limp body until, after a much discussion, it slides back into the darkness. The old bag is left alone crouching her lifeless form, watching pathetically for someone or something to answer for its premature death. The child is then taken from the bag and inconspicuously delivered to the upper stage. The bag returns to obscurity and the play ends with a usual epilogue. Throughout the play, the action is qualified by the names of Puk Floyd, Ivan Tomita, Brian Egan and King Christian.

Moonana has more to offer than a visual experience. The combination of music, puppetry and mime bears a close resemblance to classical poetry. The performers (in refer to them as puppeteers would not only be unjust, it would be unfair discrimination) make their entrances and exits in slow controlled movements. It had no desire to distance them aesthetically from the performance because they were as much a part of the performance as any of the other devices that were used. They often interacted with their puppets and their deliberate, patient motion set up a tension between the rhythm and the nature of the piece. When it seemed the storm would be too much it was restrained by the Chaplinesque figure on the parapet high above the stage. He crouched almost upon himself until he exploded himself into a bouquet of hearts and streams.

Moonana is like a Dariusz code, a deliberately that is sometimes poetic, sometimes elegant. Its centre is question rather than answer, and is restrained by the time it takes to complete an action and not by the stress placed on its individual components. It is all very controlled and very professional. To me, the most impressive and welcome part of the programme was the appearance of the giant bag-like puppets that floated in and out of the darkness like bubble-voted together. They spoke no dialogue, but their movements, linked to the music of Ivan Tomita, provided them with an abstract language. They were not and likely neither are and rarely passed the scrutiny of the audience. There is no doubt that Moonana appeals less on the emotional rather than intellectual experience of the audience, but to refer to Moonana as a "puppet show" is a gross misnomer. It is clearly a contemporary attempt at a classical code.

In retrospect, Moonana is the obvious culmination of the Tasmanian Puppet Theatre's search for a style. Over the years the theatre has tried and perfected many techniques only to discard them in favour of a new challenge. Peter insists that continual experimentation is necessary if the Puppet Theatre is to survive.

"The search and exploration for new techniques is our style," he says. "Although we lose interests at least once a year, Tasmanian audiences are still our bread-and-butter. Tasmanian has with a small population it doesn't take long to saturate the State. When this happens, the production becomes obsolete. We have to keep trying out new ideas to keep our audience support — especially in the south."

What started as a search may end up as a Sisyphus' toil, but Peter is not discouraged. "Puppetry is the theatre of the impossible. There are no conventions that constrain the form. The sky's the limit!" The metaphysics of Peter's philosophy weigh heavily on his puppets, who have to be something of a raffish. "They have to be good writers, as well as craftsmen and manipulators. The energy of the puppet must come from the puppeteer — they are not separate, distinct entities, one pre-supposes the other, which is why, in most of our shows, both are on display. A good puppeteer is something to watch as a good puppet."

Moonana is a kaleidoscope of the techniques perfected by the Puppet Theatre over the years. "Bambino", a style Peter first attempted with Tales of the Bushland in 1972, had more recently with Big Bear, which was created and directed by Tadeusz Monahan. Peter met Tadeusz, who is a director with the P.U.K. Theatre in Turkey, during his fellowship year, and invited him to come to Australia to work with his company. Following this, Peter duplicated the style with a production of Arabian Nights in 1974. Peter put his puppets behind large masks for a production of The North Wind and the Sun and many of his productions have used Black Theatre effects. Peter doesn't hesitate to use traditional rod puppets or marionettes if the production demands it, but he is always searching for different ways to redefine their limits. "There is always something different, something new to be learnt from the theatre."

In conversation, Peter makes no distinction between the art form of puppetry and the legitimate theatre, which is perhaps one of the reasons he has been so successful. He refuses to be trapped into defining the limits of his medium or setting up specifications for puppetry and permanently abhorring his potential search for new dimensions of the genre.

National Theatre Awards

What the critics say:

Spencer

N S W

Kewell

Chater

Guiken

O'Brien

O'Neill

Bell

Dickson

Norman Kewell, Gordon Chater and John Guiken, who seal for the Best Actor award in New South Wales, both was for their work in National productions — Chater for his amazing one-man performance in Signs i' Spain; The Election of Josephus Frohlich and Guiken for the strident "The Head and the Heart" in the state of Theatre Australia) for a rare de facto as Henry Carr in Ron Spropper's Frontiers.

English-born Gordon Chater is one of the best known actors in Australia. He came here to appear in a J.C. Williamson comedy, but quickly established himself as an outstanding comic artist. With his television and film work he had begun to move away from the theatre until he made his electrifying comeback as Robert O'Brien in The Election of Josephus Frohlich.

Ruby Rose's Best Actress award was almost certainly for her splendid performance as Blanche du Bois in Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire, but it is also a tribute to the sheer consistency of her work throughout the year, with highly distinctive performances in such varied roles for the Old Tote as Lovers in Eugene O'Neill's Mourning Becomes Electra, Bath in Susan Gray's Catherine Jagouard and Garie Pogson in Patrick White's Sirens at Sarrapoidie.

John Bell and Richard Wherrett, joint winners of the Best Director award, are, together with Ian Barker, the artistic directors of the National Theatre. Bell won for his splendidly innovative production of Much ado about Nothing, Wherrett for his brilliant staging of The Election of Josephus Frohlich. Wherrett, who also directed last year's Old Tote production of A Streetcar Named Desire, is a lecturer of Arts from Sydney University.

John Bell has recently directed such successes as Ben Elton's The Christmas Show, and David Williamson's The Kennelers and A Mandala of Power. His award-winning production of Much Ado About Nothing also shared the 1975 National Critics Award.

Wendy Dickson won the New South Wales Designer award, her award-winning design was for A Streetcar Named Desire for the Old Tote.

For 24-year-old playwright Signe J. Spears the first National Professional Theatre Awards must count as a triumph. He won the Best New Talent award, while the Best New Play award went to his The Election of Josephus Frohlich and this was also the vehicle for the Best Actor and Best Director awards.

The National Theatre production is now on an Australia wide tour with New Zealand, Hong Kong and Japan to follow. His play is also set for production in London and New York.

Spears has been a professional writer for three years and has works include Shut, a historical rock show, Africa, a vaudeville piece about racism, and Young Mr. White which had its premiere at the 1973 Adelaide Festival, with a revised version staged at the National this year.

S A

Top Pick: Jude Karing may have mixed feelings about her selection as the Actress of the Year in South Australia since she always seems to remember that she is an actor not an actress. Still, she is undeniably a fine acting person, and the award category at least allows for recognition of another polished actor, Eileen Hodgeman.

In Mr. Karing's case, the judges must have been influenced not only by her work for the South Australian Theatre Company, and recently in And Then There Were One at Little, but also for her leading role in the Caroline Chaw Show. This innocent and positively propagandist piece was aimed at performance, but nonetheless one of the most capable theatrical events of the year.

Mr Hodgeman's award is his second in recent times. He also picked up the Critics' Circle Presentation in South Australia. Both awards are a reflection of his contribution to theatre down the years, but especially for his performance as Mathias in The Last of the Knickerbockers, one of the SATC's undisputed successes of the year.

Choice of George Ogilvie as director of the year is both obvious and pleasing. He had his share of critics during his tenure as artistic director of the SATC, but what artistic director worthy of the title hasn't? His achievement from 1971, when he took over dual his departure early this year, was a solid one, not only in individual productions but in giving the company shape and style and making it solid as its own permanent home in The Playhouse.

In the winner of Mr Karing, he might equally have qualified as actor of the year. His last screen job with the SATC was to play a clown in The Christmas Show. He did so with a skill that was reminiscent of Keaton. And taking of Lovers. — I don't know how he has time to spare but play — Josephus Frohlich surely takes the honours so far — but it is an excellent example of perhaps the most remarkable feat of this young playwright's talent: his capacity to understand and dramatize areas of experience one would have thought foreign to him.

Add recognition of Shaun Guiken, now, like Karing, Ogilvie and Spears, departed the local scene, for the imaginative theatricality of his sets and you have awards that are bestowed on individuals who deserve them and on a dramatic art in South Australia theatre.

Karing

Hodgeman

Bell

Ogilvie

Q L D[illegible]

1. Journal of the American Medical Association, 1997; 277: 1001-1005.

1000

1999

1998

Table 1

Best Actress: Pat Thomson has been awarded Best Actress and Best New Talent in Queensland. The latter award is interesting because her presence, sense of timing, developed vocal tone, and that wonderful weathered look suggest she might have been round "When Hancus was an actor." Not surprising that her awards were for Entertainment, Mr. Sloane and The Mirror of Bernadette.

David Claiborne's award was for the same part in The Misandrone, one of those cases where as he also produced and directed the show. This is good Claiborne territory because he has a secure sense of style, a rare feeling for the delights of language, and an appreciation of the ways and looks French speak.

Best Director went to Joe MacEliam for the Spaulding Theatre Company, producers of The Department. Joe is a director who looks for the person of a piece. With many actors, especially under-performed ones, this is risky because it can be over-balanced into melodrama. When it works, however, it really flies. Deanna is drama, and actors and audience alike respond to the demands.

Another award goes to the QTC for Best Designer. James Ralston has piled up considerable experience in the past few years with external work on opera and ballet, and his award was for general highly consistent achievement. He uses the resources of the QTC without extravagance, he presents the actors with highly workable spaces, he delights in the eyes of his audience, and on the rarely with the SGHQ Theatre stage, he is holding his own... no more conclusions.

V I C

Garry Haddinsworth. Increasingly, the Victorian awards have been almost scooped up by Australian Performing Group members, who were four out of six in The won of Miss Gidley, (Best Actor) is well deserved after a decade of tremendously skilled and consistently excellent work. Miss recently he has been seen as Monk O'Neill in Hibbard's A Street of the Assassination, as the corrupt/romanticist in The Wife Comedy Club and as

Information on all Topics To Address

Twisted Nerve (Bob Acton) has also appeared in the last two, but especially as Melba in 4 Jesus To This was a virtuoso performance, combining terrific singing, fine physical acting and a streak of aggression.

After that, it's fairly clear why Jack Hubbard went last. New Play, with A Town For Marlow, is fulfilling the most requirements of what a popular play should be.

Best Director, Mick Rodden is mainly the most consistently stirring director in Melbourne, showing what a little imagination and support with actors can achieve. He also had a hand in the re-staging of last year's Marlene's Game of Love and Chance, and Anders of Fjersholm Island.

Best Designer was a bit of a surprise in Carol Porter, but her work, on Handke's My First My, Taser was functional and very beautiful too.

In the New Talent department, Lady Clark took the honors. Far from being a neophyte, she is an accomplished actress, as evidenced by her work in The Powerless, City Square and Obsessive Believers on Small Screen.

W A

"Harper Lee" Anne's second effort, December is at its best in the August of 1959. The 1970 productions included Williams' The Glass Menagerie, and Woman's Courage of St. Ignace Day with The East of the Sun, West of the Moon probably bringing out best Anne's gift for making actors into an ensemble. Most popular success of the season was Bennett's Madame Curie.

Ball Dred (Best Designer), each in species and gossamer sets, and chosen eventually as A Man for All Seasons (popular). The Great Book (popular), Atomic and Old Love (popular) and The Last of the Earthmen (popular cluster). Earlier successes included numerous Hello, Gosh, dears.

Martin Jones (Best New Talent) is a graduate of the Western Association Theatre Arts Course at WAIT. Jones has made a smooth transition from professional theater. Whereas as student production he was invariably outstanding in natural voice, he now shows a flair for comedy, and was recently seen in Shaw's Men of Seneca at the Hollywood Bowl.

Best Play was Malcolm Karpis's adaptation of Kafka's The Trial. Amazingly, Karpis is better known as an actor (Blanchet and Kasper being his outstanding roles in 1976), also as an arranger of spectacular sword-fighting in Blanchet. He also adapted Orwell's Animal Farm for theatre.

TABLE 1

1000

Abstract

10

100

10

The Awards

NEW SOUTH WALES

QUEENSLAND

SOUTH AUSTRALIA

VICTORIA

WESTERN AUSTRALIA

BEST ACTION	Gordon Chater John Gustin	Daniel Clendenen	Edwin Haslamman	Mina Gillies
BEST ACTRESS	Rodriga Noma	Pat Thompson	Audie Kuring	Berlyn Kraps
BEST DIRECTOR	John Bell Richard Wherrett	Joe MacCallum	George Ogilvie	Mark Rudge	Aaron Noonan
BEST DESIGNER	Wendy Dickson	James Rutherford	Shawn Oulton	Carol Porter	Bill Dowd
BEST NEW TALENT	Steve Spears	Pat Thompson	Steve Spears	Liddy Clarke	Martin Jones
BEST NEW PLAY	Benjamin Franklin	The Department	Young Ma	A Toast to Melba	Amoral Farm/The Trial

Richard Wherrett

The Playwrights' Conference

The Australian National Playwrights' Conference has fulfilled a twofold function, which I argued at its opening on the 15 May, and in the morning-up two weeks later.

- 1 To encourage new writers and new writing from established writers.
- 2 To provide the means by which the profession as a whole can come together to resolve mutual problems and inspire new activity.

I believe the value of the conference to be considerable, for three reasons.

- 1 The encouragement of Australian writing is the means by which we come to understand ourselves as people and as a nation. This, I expect, would not be questioned. This year, of the 15 playwrights who submitted work, eight had their plays workshopped for five days (five hours a day), with a final public reading and discussion, eight had public readings of their work, with a discussion following and a remuneration by the artistic director, and roughly 20 participated as observers standing at rehearsals and seminars, with diaries and visiting personnel always available for explanation and discussion.

At times, over the five conferences, more established authors such as Alan Seymour, Dorothy Hewett, Allen de Souza, Roger Paine and Steve J. Spears have participated as new territory.

How can the value of this be measured? The facts are that roughly a third of the plays workshopped have proceeded to production. And there are cases where writers such as Mary Gage and Kenneth Ross, have progressed from (a) observer participation to (b) having a play workshopped, to (c) having a play produced (Mary Gage's Everyone's a General at the Perth Playhouse, and Ken Ross's The Smoker at the MTC and Slowly at the West. More at June Street). For the rest, the profiles in the future. It is an act of faith, but I know this: at Mineral two years ago, we never knew when the next Australian play was coming forth; today we are pleased two months ahead, and the competition is real too.

The conference has undoubtedly contributed to this growth in quality. This year, options on four of the plays workshopped were taken out at the conference.

- 2 The seminar provides the focus for the profession as a whole to come together. There were 10 this year, one and a half hours' discussion each on all manner of issues. It is important to remember that institutions need not be made at the seminar for the seminar to prove constructive. Discussion commenced before and after the event, and the concentrated nature of conference, by which one is, as it were, captive to the situation, demands that answers be sought on the issues raised and put all such of new questions be posed.

I do not mean that to sound heavy, precious or academic. It is relaxed and eminently stimulating. It is sensationally as valuable an activity as the workshoping and the most difficult to articulate.

I was delighted to welcome this year Roy Lewis, Peter Gynan, Katherine Brulhas, Bob Ellis, Graham McDall, John Bell, Anne Fisher, Ron Southgate, Ken Horley, Terry Clark, Arthur Dignam, Garrie Hatcherson, Mick Rudge, Tony Ingram, Hilary Linstead, Philip Parsons, Deacon Warburton, Paul Lee, Bill Redmond, Hilary Parling, Alex

Ross, to name but a few.

I was also pleased to welcome Steve Wilson and John Osborne. It is important to realise, of the overseas guests, two things.

- 1 They function to provide an outside point of reference, in this case as English one.
- 2 They are paid for indirectly by outside funds, not by conference funds.

It is a lottery, of course — it is impossible to determine the contribution they can make. John Osborne, I believe, was entertained in us at the first place, and arguably had no right to accept the invitation. The subsequent bad publicity I am at present here, obviously, to tell Steve Wilson, on the other hand, was generous, perceptive, open and positive, with a grain dust to offer from the English experience.

It was also a great pleasure to welcome 14 critics from across the nation for the final three days, a process by which we could encourage the concept of their being an integral part of the profession. All the more so it is that some points in understanding the conference's aims and roles. Of the 14, four only (Len Radie, Melbourne, the Age, Tally Davis, Sydney, The Sun, John Kirby, Adelaide, the Sunday Mail and David Marr, National Times) sought out either Bill Sheeham, the administrator, or myself for comment — a judgement of what this conference was about would rarely demand this. Yet, without words or discussion, Frances Kelly's "impression" in the Australian suggests that the conference was "worthwhile". I find this deeply satisfying.

Finally, I was delighted that the conference concluded with the inaugural presentation of the National Professional Theatre Awards. While awards in television and film proliferate confusingly, as award in the theatre by which the profession itself can vote for and acknowledge quality I believe to be uncommonly worth while.

Judi Farr in Hamlet

'Stimulating, tender, funny, but slightly shallow'

GOING BUSINESS

BOB ELLIS

Going Business, Premier Theatre Downstairs, Sydney. Opened 6 May 1977. Director: Richard M. Barrett. Lighting designer: (by rep manager) Neil Simpson.

Hamlet by Richard Brindshaw. Mr Darwin, Robert Bayle, Mrs Darwin, Judi Farr, Charlie Newman. (Starring) Judi, Harold.

The Coroner's Report by John Summers. Irene, Judi Farr. The Man, Right Center!

The Flow by Mel Ferrer. The Wife, Judi Farr. The Husband, Ralph Cosentino. The Visitor, Robert Ellis.

Going Business, an entertaining, sleek and, on the whole, worthy evening of short plays intelligently staged by Richard Wherrett at the Premier Theatre Downstairs. In a brief short, I think, of being a formidable occasion. Each writer showed a lot of promise and the audience had a whole of a sense, but the overall effect was warmly forgivable.

Not, of course, that you can do that much in the absence of a brilliant idea, with these or four actors, no set and 15 minutes of time. Richard Brindshaw did a good deal with rucks and money men in Business, a semi-allegorical extended revue sketch about a dim suburban couple whose unkempt, bearded son proposes to marry a gorilla, and keeps her around for an evening meal of bananas, plus farmhouse relishing and pining at the audience. In order to make her less nervous, the parents put on monkey masks, and the evening theatrical effect of this, which would go down quite well in deepest Poland, together with one of the dialogues about the probable substance of the gorilla's children, and the dawning, endearing affect of the small space, elevated it for minutes on end into something more valued than its next frequent foe, that of a Paul Hogan sketch. The performances were good, in particular Sophie Thomson as the income, chaotic, degenerate son. The audience booed with laughter, but a stunned but heavily restrained at the night club song in Calvary about marrying a gorilla ("If you could see her through my eyes, / She wouldn't be Jewish at all") for me to applaud its originality.

The second play, The Coroner's Report by John Summers, was rather more original and surprising, not so much in conception (it takes place in one of those bleak, posthumous interstices in the Great Void), but in the tenderness of the characterisation of the central personage, a worn-out, weary virgin speaker making the long voyage of her dreamful tragedy, from self-interest to self-sacrifice, that brought her to this dull quietus. Judi Farr's extraordinary performance was full of that sort of sacramental sacramental glow which rarely if at all find further from the women of a former generation. The poignant inquirer of the ghostly interrogation seemed in the face of this audience downright pertinent.

The most successful play (because it's apparently funny) is The Flow by Mel Ferrer. It deals with the fantasy world one which a vulgar workmanlike witness upon being fired from his job in his fantasy world, he is appointed chairman of the board over a Rolle-Royce, has a beautiful wife, a elegantly cocked, and falls into a sexual disaster. The theatrical styles vary wildly and the best, a Noel Coward adultery triangle, goes from both Down and Ralph Cosentino some of the wildest performances I've seen in this style-stained country. Cosentino, in particular, especially in his recurring raked attacks on the furniture, being the carpet, smothering the chairs, throwing up and swallowing unwellcome telegrams, and at one point leaving the theatre altogether and ending around in the parking lot outside, displayed that sort of disciplined brash courage that is usually seen in only the most farious and emboldened actors.

On the whole, a good and stimulating, tender and funny, but slightly shallow evening, well worth having seen and a great boon no doubt to three potentially worthwhile writers.

'The play served the purpose of confirming attitudes for a partisan audience'

THE CAKE MAN

REX CRAMPTON

The Cake Man by Robert J. Mervin, Presented by the Aboriginal Arts Board of the Australia Council in association with Robert Mervin and Brian Syron. Bands Theatre, Adelaide, N.S.W. Opened 20 April 1977. Director: George Upton, designer: Wendy Dickson. Music composed by William Turner. Film sequence directed by Gillian Armstrong. Lighting design: Simon Jenkins. Production manager, Graham Brown. Cast: Mark, Ruby, Jarlene Saunders, Ron Pampalao, Teddy Phillips, Steve Burnett, Pauline, Stuart Neilson, Brian Syron. From: Manager: George Mervin, Sydney; Director: Robert Faggner, Chicago; Music: Colin

When I went to see The Cake Man I had not read the play, but I had high expectations related to the director (George Upton), the designer (Wendy Dickson), and the cast (which included Brian Syron and Mark Cullen). I know that the play had originally been workshoped at the Black Theatre Arts Centre, was about black Australians and had been written by me. I probably, without having formulated the idea, suspected something fairly startling and tough in the area of personal and social injustice (like Lorraine Hansberry, say). The reasons for the partial disappointment of these expectations are hard to disentangle and are not all related in a direct way to those responsible for the production (in an attempt to disentangle these and, simultaneously, to cast some light on the incidental factors which can contribute to one's attitude in a production, I had better take things in chronological order on the evening in question).

First of all, before even approaching the theatre, there's the problem of the expectations. They are unconsidered and illogical. Must this play, because it is something of a first (certainly in my experience), since the whole was against social injustice to black people in Australia? Must it be expressed in the terms (emotional strategy) that I somehow suspect? Must it look revolutionary, provide answers? Such presuppositions are manifestly unfair, but they are, nevertheless, part of the unconscious attitude I bring with me.

Then, still before the play begins, there's the experience of the other members of the audience and the audience. For some reason I always find the Bands Theatre slightly depressing and the flat that audience who assemble will only total about 40 males or even more so. I am, in my usual wondering why I don't like watching the rest of the audience (lingering and obviously waiting they could enter from the back of the auditorium, not the front). The small thrust stage seems to have been raised since I saw it last, but it still seems to have nothing to do with them, being locked up against a dead wall which gives no feeling of back-stage depths and possibilities. As a thrust space it gives me a feeling of cardboard-theatre and school-hall make-believe. Sitting in the audience makes me feel part of a sticky diffuse minority — like Christmas in pagan Rome, perhaps.

Retreating into the programme, I am told that, "With his childhood experience of Mission life, Robert has written a powerful and dramatic message that should be seen by all Australians, black and white. Through the skilful writing Robert has not allowed the strong sociological message of his play to be overwhelmed by dramatic values." I find myself speculating on the people who have found their way to this theatre to see this play and guessing that most of them are ready to be suckled between the eyes by the sociological message and stand as an end of manuscripts about literary merit.

The play begins with a short prologue in which an archetypal Aboriginal family unit (father, mother, son) is isolated by an equally abstract group of white men (pilot, soldier, civilian). Let me get it clear that, ultimately, I thought Brian Syron gave a fine performance as Sweet William, but his initial appearance, looking not at all like a hunter in bushbush and bushy make-up, throwing his gamine down behind as "sweetest" rock, did nothing for me, in the way of getting the evening off to a convincing start. What do I mean by convincing? Well, Brian Syron, clothed and as the character of Sweet William, talking directly to the audience, is convincing and so are the film segments at the end of the play. I guess you could make the case of argument that's intended here convincing on film. The images and figures of the great soldier, and civilian, however, appear in super-theatrical style subsequent from rear-projection is abruptly transformed into the real figure by the removal of a small screen. The screen probably set on its track. In this theatre I feel too close to overlook such details, yet not close enough to forgive them. But once the whole nature of the space seems to assist anything in the way of a theatrical coup, it is something of a triumph for director and designer to have brought it off at all.

Let's be dead, the archetypal father has articles of clothing thrown to him. With some protestation he puts them on, transforming to the Sweet William of the subsequent plot-line. The scenes, which might have been a fully developed savage-discovering-mission — and — working-out-how-to-mis-interpreters feature, is treated with somewhat anxious-worring haste — the punishment is only a gesture — giving the impression of a certain lack of faith in Western Civilisation. Nationalistic drama. 1977

Una produzione di John Bell

MOLTO RUMORE Per Nulla di Guglielmo Shakespeare

Wrote a crazy pella e splendida teatro!

Donde l'impresario

Fondamentale colui!

Donde l'impresario

Spelling, intelligente, esuberante, empatico, esuberante, esuberante!

Donde l'impresario

Scelte il Gruppo

a parole cinque settimane

nimrod upstairs

Telefono del botteghino: 69 5008

RECITATO IN INGLESE

the idea. It is, after all, only a translation that there is something unsatisfactory about the conception.

Sweet William in a prison-dog, drunken, down-and-out black in Sydney. In a long monologue of jokes ("my conviction of an Aboriginal crow black, black, black...") I, phonetically illegitimate actor ("how the area last is wing"), and rhetorical questions ("what do you want from me?"). Sweet William comes across as a good blend of nature-like observation and naturalism, realisation, and charm. Brian Syron does this extremely well in a voice that manages to sound tight and maintain clarity — a difficult feat of vocal accommodation which is only matched by the skill of the writer in doing the same thing. He then proceeds to transition us with a flashback account of how he came to Sydney. A small set is assembled by black-clad stage hands. At this point I began to register that the play is presented in almost as many styles as there are scenes. I wondered if this had always been the author's intention, or whether it was the result of workshoping, the choice of the director, or merely generally explication. The set represents the kitchen of the slum in which William and Ruby and their two children live (as Cullen, I think). The scene that comes next (William is drinking as a symptom of human alien, dehumanisation, and cultural deprivation, but faith in him and his remaining dependence on the Bible, the son's lack of respect for his father, the poverty-stricken sickness of the younger child. All this is conveyed in the realistic imitation of mainstream Australian drama, but thematic connections with the rather abstract scenes like "gill" of Christianity, the father/son relationship (a theme close to When a Servant comes, the picture has been of) moving element of this score. The "acting" here seemed to set the pace and tone for the subsequent Mousetrap scenes in which Cleopatra's conscience is caught.

I should say at this point that Tennessee Clark's first act for the play dramatised the "theatrical" position of which I speak. A precariously tilted platform with steps leading down from it, the set evoked the earliest skene of the Greek theatre — a rigidly demanding focal-point. The back of the platform was so constructed as to allow characters to "appear" suddenly and emotionally over the top of the set. In the play scene the function of the set was clearly defined in terms of the purpose of the scene, which is generally to focus attention on Cleopatra and the Queen, and on Hamlet's pleasure in manipulating them. By putting the coast on the skene and the actors on the downstage floor, the play simply provided a foreground for the real and silent drama on the upper stage. My only doubts about the visual qualities of the production relate to the very artistic lighting, and to the ad nauseam and conventionally unnecessary underlighting, usually evident in the series of protest monologues.

Apart from the mentioned monologues, the facility of the production was underplayed by a few portraits. Tom Condon's speech after Oskar Hjorten seemed to have straggled straight from his excellent translation of Les Darcy in the company's previous production, A Sporting Double. The officers who first sight the Ghost speak in much the same talk-warms style. Australian, and I felt that some more vigorous attempts at rendering the language would have given the opening the desired conviction. Claire Crowther's rather measured Ophelia combined contrived cynicism in her sanity with a brilliant sensibility in her insanity, and I felt that the spontaneous laughter occasioned by her mad scenes, in which her face was powdered white as a ghoul's, was ill-judged, especially as it carried the implication of the same "madness" as we saw in Hamlet's earlier feigned madness.

Finally, the excitement of the one clashing scenes seemed retrospectively to invite more excitement earlier in the production, but I feel certain that this initial tension is entirely the fault of the great hero which Cleopatra's cast is forced to serve. A constant and clear readiness like this needs an appropriate space, and it is the greatest single obstacle to success for the fine company that there is no such space.

'... with perhaps a few reservations, I can go along with most of the superlatives'

A CHORUS LINE

RAYMOND STANLEY

A Chorus Line. Book by James Kirkwood and Nicholas Dante; music, Marvin Hamlisch; lyrics, Edward Kleban. Presented by J.C. Williamson Productions Ltd. (Kevin Brinkley, managing director) and Michael Lajthay (executive director). Led by choreographer with the New York Shakespeare Festival (James Frawley, producer) and Film Productions. Her Majesty's Sydney Opera House 22 May 1977. Original production conceived, choreographed and directed by Michael Bennett (now-deceased). Book, lyrics, choreography and direction recommended for Australia by Margaret Lee and Jeff Harkin (Sydney producers). Robert Goss and Fred H. Benda (Sydney). Robin Wagner (conductor). Thomas Y. Aldridge (soloist). Thomas Mawer, musical director. Paul Smith (national director). Sam Martens, orchestrator by Ted Green, Beverly Kay, Jonathan Linnick, music adaptation for Australian production, Peter Langstaff.

With David Collins, Angela Ayres, Tina Barmatz, Leah Chanters, Cheryl Clark, Ross Chanters, Elie Dimphe, Camille Edwards, Pamela Goldstein, Glenda Goss, Raymond North, Patricia O'Connell, Scott Prisman, Margherita Rendall, Joel Singh, Marlene Brown, Julie Taylor, Ken Schmeiderer, Andrew Simons, Greg Sims, Louise Marie Smith, Charles E. Tinsley, Peter Tappin, Geoffrey Underhill, Kevin van Nieuwenhuysen.

Rarely does a musical arrive in Australia which, having been showered with critical superlatives by critics and audiences alike in its country of origin, is obviously all set to repeat the process here.

A push was set in the late 1950s by My Fair Lady, which ran so long in Melbourne that a second company had to be formed for Sydney. For the next decade, almost every musical brought forth hopes of being another My Fair Lady and, although several did quite well at the box office, the Lavender-Loose musical as it provided the yardstick.

Then, in 1968, came a very different type of musical, Mousetrap. It was blockbuster No. 1, followed four years later by another musical with a difference, Jesus Christ Superstar. Now comes A Chorus Line, the one with perhaps the biggest reputations of all preceding it.

For months the publicity machine has been churning out stories about the musical, which in turn have sparked off others, and A Chorus Line has been the star, reaching gigantic proportions not achieved by its predecessors.

Fanning this publicity war have been the likes of its never having an empty seat at any of its several American productions, the colossal musical in Australia at half a million dollars, three weeks of paid previews, and the taking at the box office of about a million dollars by opening night. Inevitably it becomes the musical to see and the next step — overtures at least, and possibly more than — is taken with the black market.

Finally comes the official opening night and with it either confirmation of all that one has heard about the show — or else the disillusionment, or maybe perhaps, just a slight feeling of disappointment. And all that, a stage reviewer has failed to draw upon some of the superlatives already used to describe the show, or look around for a new angle, one of possibly not yet covered in the face of all one has heard, is a very, very hard task to achieve.

Cheer's first — perhaps over-riding — impression at the opening night in Sydney was the constant reminder of applause that reached again and again throughout the theatre after each number. Surely one has never heard so much applause before on an opening night? Yet one of the management heads candidly admits it was not quite as great as at some of the previous, and director Jeff Harkin says applause is nearly always heard at such a push in all performances of A Chorus Line throughout the world — and if it is not, then there must be something lacking in the performance.

By now the story of the show must be familiar. A Broadway director underwriting from an initial 24 for eight dancers to appear in a musical. Just what kind of a musical it is and what it is about is never revealed.

The dancers — who, as far as one can discern, in their dance to clock-work precision, at first glance are of near-equal talent — are soon narrowed down to 27. Then come the sometimes harrowing moments, when each is made to relate biographical details and demonstrate her or his abilities.

At first one is moved by the talent on display and wishes the unenviable task the director has to face in making his choices. One watches points carefully, though, and notes that one has the edge over that one in dancing, one performer can carry a tune just that much better, and another seems personable, whereas so-and-so seems really uninvolved.

Winner of the 1976 National Children's Award

John Bell's production of

MUCH ADO

About Nothing
by William Shakespeare

'Big roaring fun and a splendid theatre'

— Sydney Observer

'Fabulously Talented'

— Daily Telegraph

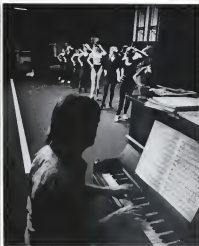

'Witty, intelligent, exuberant, emotional, sensual, and robust'

— The Australian

Saturday 22 June for five weeks only

nimrod upstairs

box office telephone 695003

And comes the question: just how much is deliberately put on for the performance, how much for what it calls calls for, do certain cast members fall short? An impossible job to convince the audience that the right dancers have been finally selected — or is the director's judgement to be shown up, and that is all part of the play? On opening night I certainly did not agree with the director's final talent line-up, not on the performances given. The tension lies the danger of producing a show like this, can all members of the cast maintain their performances to the exact degree required? Perhaps that is why many who saw the show overseas maintained it could never be properly staged in Australia.

Miraculously, it does hold together in Australia, and, with perhaps a few tiny reservations, I can go along with most of the superlatives which have been passed on the musical. In my opinion, though, some of the performances are somewhat muted by histrionic abilities not quite on a par with dancing and singing.

To me it is a meeting show, honest a somewhat compromised one. With its high-powered dance numbers, possible vocal, superb lighting and sound-engineering effects, it is all calculated to hypnotise. Occasionally it is good, particularly around the middle, which an interval might have softened. There are, too, some rather subsidiary moments — which would obviously have greater appeal in America — that could have been deleted or maybe condensed with advantage for the Australian production. I particularly refer to the segments involving the homosexual, Paul.

The final scene, where the 17 auditions, plus the director and his assistant Larry, dance twirlily around the stage in ghastly costumes, as opposed to their hedonistic rehearsal clothes, is stunning, but appears to have little relation to the action which has gone before, except to provide a curtain call. Had it been the night finally selected and supposedly showing them at a later date in actual performance, it would have been understandable. It does, however, make a definite high-level lull in the show, so one cannot really object. But for a musical which otherwise is so realistic...

Just as Wear and Tear and Jarvis Cress Superstar have appeared, what are now some of Australia's leading talents, so a few years hence some of our leading performers will trace the pathways of their careers back to A Chorus Line. Of that, I have no doubt.

With few exceptions, the cast possesses a very high level of talent indeed, but there are two whom I would place above all others: One is Scott Pearson, who plays the director Zach, the puppet-master whose voice and personality dominates throughout. The other is Pamela Gibbons who has demonstrated before — notably in Jump London in Yu Yu Reverie and Free (to me she and Noel Ferrer were the only good things about that atrocious musical) — that she has just potential as the hard-boiled shrew. Now Gibbons can take her rightful place right beside Davis and Peryman.

It is certainly going to be a tough job for the cast to keep up the standard of performance. And apart from those on stage, one must also pay tribute to the backstage workers, who ensure that everything is working to perfection. Not easy, one assumes, for such a show.

Yes, despite my qualms, I really did enjoy A Chorus Line. It is obviously a great musical and can be heartily recommended to all and sundry. I can't wait for an opportunity to view it again.

A Chorus Line could well follow the procedure set by M. J. Fox Lady and Godspell with the formation of a second company. Perhaps more importantly how is it going to affect the future of other musicals in Australia? After this show, it will be doubly difficult to promote others. What could possibly top it?

'Is this . . . part of some diabolical plot to prove that . . . Australian plays really are bloody awful?'

UNSPRINKABLE ACTS

DOROTHY HEWITT

Unsprinkable Acts by Kella Free. Old Tote Theatre Company, Parade Theatre, Kensington. NSW. Opened 1 June 1977. Director, Peter Collingwood; designer, David Tove; music composed by John Ross.

The Chronicle (Melbourne): Colin Don Franco, Paul Jay, Ben Hindrich, Wendyann, Meg Gilman, Stephen, Robert Phillips, Betty, Susan Parsons.
Dr. Spenser: Bobi, Myra, Catherine Wilson, Michael, Susan Mary, Claude, Susan Parsons, Logan, Ben Hindrich.

How is it even possible to take Unsprinkable Acts at the Tote seriously, or to worry about these two crude plays misquoting in the Parade as theatre?

In the Tote's final death blow to the Australian play, part of some diabolical plot to prove that they were right, all the time, and Australian plays really are bloody awful? It kept reminding me of the MTC "inhumanly obscure voices" at Great Street last year, an experience which appeared to be "designed to fail".

And yet it was only too apparent that all was on the up-and-up, and the Tote really did think this was the best they could offer the patron (and this at a time when Richard Wherrett of the Norrad has gone on record as saying that the building of good Australian plays means the Norrad can no longer hope to cope with production).

With mounting doubt, I read the programme notes and heard how director Peter Collingwood had written a very nice letter to Colin Free, saying, "I don't suppose you're writing for theatre these days?" It was not of 1974 but never once happened in La Maestra, the Pantom and the old Norrad, let alone the 18 years since that first great flowering. Oh dear old Tote! Where have you been all the days of our lives? And what a funny old expensive barbershop hobby you turned out to be!

Anyway, as the story goes, Colin Free released and rewrote two radio plays, changed the writer round a bit, and, boy presto, the Tote had another taken Aussie season. How it does take one back!

Remember the old Australian play seasons when the audience turned up dutifully to take their medicine once or twice a year, and it was all paid for by the Commonwealth Foundation?

Dr Brown's Body, a kind of cracking science-fiction melodrama, was the first of the double bill. It was about a technical virgin called Maya and a technical stud called Chuck who once made love in the ruined quarters at Tarwe Springs, a top-secret U.S. installation base harnessing solar energy, now wrapped in 15 acres of plastic.

Chuck, supposedly dead, turns up as an invisible headless man. When Pantom does his best under the gases and the steroids, and Maya films, as the scientific Swedish man to assist the character with minor prostheses, swapping black-glove ritual acts with Chuck (Surely this couldn't mean anything as obvious as a cover-up to mean? Colin Free says the play draws on "a long-remembered interest in Surrealism and Pop Art, and takes inspiration from Christy's earth-wrapped soul mate").

"After that I need a good stiff whisky," said the man beside me.

"Reflex is his habit," said the man in the seat behind.

Luckily the audience fled back after interval for The Ultimate Obscurity. It wasn't. It was marginally better than Dr Brown's Body, all those good actors doing their socks off, Reg Gifford, with a Cymbeline director's hug, using every trick of an old pro to reveal Winkler as the ex-porno-writer-films-on-one-days, with some kind of wild, naive life, and Rodney Phillips giving the stock director Judge a Dickinson kind of energy.

But, swamped with "literary phrases", word-play, and clumsy alliteration, it was all such miserably old-fashioned, messy, late-middle-aged stuff — "Glossa bore for a melody behind the rotunda".

How one longed for a Hubbard, a Shaw or a Ramsay!

Glory for a pleasant Saturday arvo on Arty ABC, I had a treat.

But then of course that is not what the theatre is all about, and the ultimate alchemy is to think it is.

Engrossing shows for the young and very young

PUPPETS AND PANTOMIMES

ALLISON JONES

After May (combination of glove puppet, shadow puppet, marionette and black shadow, created and directed by Peter Halls, The Puppet Project, Recording Hall, Open House, Sydney).

Deer May (about the pantomime), directed, created and performed by The Puppetarium (David and Sue Salbitt), Martin Street Theatre, Sydney.

Lavin Red Riding Hood (pantomime), directed and created by Peter Williams. St James Playhouse, Sydney.

The Puppet Project, Frances Michaels, Margot Lloyd, Michele Chappell, Peter Williams, Yvonne Parnham.

On a Puppet's Pantomime, directed by Jack Mannix. PACT Co-operative, St Andrew's Church House, Sydney.

Puppets and pantomimes — two entirely different styles of puppet shows, both engrossing. After May relies on music and movement, with an use of the spoken word. The pantomime tells us all the more is that of May (the Cymbeline note in the dramatic Shakespearean orchestration says only strong and percussion) and the "story" is about form, very large ones manipulated in black theatre.

The events in the life of the face are unprovingly surreal and dramatic actor gathering interrupted by a fierce storm, a light appears, a praying mantis (its approach suggested by the use of a shadow puppet), the birth of a new queen and a battle between the two queens leading to the happy departure of the old one. The movements of the puppets are expressive and the action is well matched to the changing moods of the music to convey a wide range of emotions.

One of the dangers of puppet shows is a tendency to a rambling story-line and misuse of dialogue. After May avoids these pitfalls by eschewing words and relying on pure visual images, backed by music. Pantomime films words there by using a known story and having most of its dialogue already provided, the same technique used by The Puppetarium in their previous show, The Trachea Ring.

The choice of an existing story for a puppet play does not by any means imply that the puppeteers are taking the easy way out. A lot of proving, selecting and arranging has obviously taken place, and the result is a successful adaptation of a difficult story. Exceptions might be taken to some of the elements chosen, but the main thing is that the story line is kept clear and simple.

Particularly good was the way the conventions of children's theatre were used to further the understanding of the story and not as distracting misdirections. The hand puppets here of addressing their audience, combined with the encouragement of audience participation, made it easy to bridge difficult gaps in the narrative and emphasise possible obvious points and so make sure that even the very young get something out of the story. The two puppeteers provided a convincing range of 15 voices for their marionettes and all the characters were distinctive and memorable.

Both of these shows could be enjoyed by older children and even adults, but Lavin Red Riding Hood is obviously directed at the very young child, simple and lively. The basic fairy story is a good one for pantomime use, as both the dame (grandma) is being gloves and red shoes to go with her ugly story and the villain are built in. In this role Peter Williams made a really master wolf, with a touch of wilderness in his long-maned, American-accented portrayal.

Well-known songs were fitted into the scenario, either straight or adapted — "Herrmann's Hinkaway" made a good stinky signature-piece for the wolf. Some of the lyrics business fitted in well with the action, too, as when the wolf's knocking at the door turned into a conversation "knock-knock" and wolf then asked the audience what grandma.

PACT's "do-it-yourself" pantomime" was something else again. It can't really be considered as a spectator sport, as the adults are regarded mainly as the means of getting the children to the site (though some pleasure can be gained by watching your little ones cooing around seeing "horror" heads or combining to form dancing seven-legged spiders). The whole idea of the exercise is child involvement, both as a casual basis and a semi-permanent one, as all are welcome. The permanent one is all used in 20, most will at school.

The basic structure, useful as there is one, involves a set of solid started characters as much of a pantomime, with the audience putting in all over the place (all in together on the same base floor) singing, marching, gathering, holding up an "instant inflatable plastic behind all which changed into an "instant inflatable plastic again", which they then fall upon and killed — all directed by a fairy with a whistle, a useful prop in the current age. Long for adult spectators, but obviously happily enjoyed by the participating children.

It would be interesting to know how much open-off there is from all this child entertainment: whether it all goes any further than the actual performance. Certainly, in our household, it is even normally a bedtime of do-it-yourself drama, songs and puppetry, then holding pantomimes with recognisable elements from all productions, as well as destructively original ideas.

T

From a theatrical point of view, a fine production — but . . .

COUNT DRACULA

KARL HUBERT

Count Dracula by Ted Tiller (Tasmania Theatre Company, Theatre Royal, Hobart) opened 19 April 1977. Director, John Lawrence. Designer, Ray Bryant.

Count Dracula, Baron Harker, Mina Murray, Clara Mollison, Jonathan Harker, Harry Swann, Professor Helsing, Renfield, Quincey Seward, Hazeel Elgin, with Vito (Johnny), Ross (Shirley), Peter (Peter), and Dolly.

One of the intangibles a theatre company must take into account when selecting a play for production is audience taste or rather the change it may be undergoing. It may be found that the most careful analysis fails to show up changes.

An example is the recent production by the Tasmania Theatre Company of Ted Tiller's Count Dracula. The play has not only suffered in a former Raymond Duparc as Professor Van Helsing. Gavin Hamilton as Count Dracula.

Tiller's Count Dracula

Dracula was intended as an exercise in audience-building. It was intended to attract, in particular, young people who, nourished by often questionable television fare, would want to see spectacular theatre with a dash of horror.

It did not quite work out as planned, and this apparently for two reasons. The "enlightened" young generation does not believe in vampires, while regular theatregoers in Tasmania apparently prefer to see more conventional fare (for instance, a good thriller by Agatha Christie).

It cannot be ruled out that another little could have made some difference. Counts from the region beyond Hungary have lost their appeal, their use as contemporary theatre could, at best, be that of characters to be ridiculed.

And there was evidence that the younger members of the audience saw Dracula in this light. To them he was a figure of fun, a third-rate comic.

From the purely theatrical point of view

"You are falling asleep. Deeper and deeper to sleep." Heidi Alger and Gavin Hamilton

Dracula was a fine production. Theatrically, it is a difficult piece to stage, with as many features and costume front-ends and its magic tricks.

It must have been quite difficult to engage an actor who also is an accomplished magician. Producer John Unwin brought in Herbert Gavin Hamilton, and the choice was an excellent one (Hall may through the Hobart season, Mr Hamilton became quite ill, but kept going with the help of assistants).

Clara Williams played Mina, and she proved another good choice. She was equally convincing as the new victim of Dracula, the fiancée of Jonathan (Harry Scott), and as one who comes close to being a vampire. Here, the moved provocatively, almost indelicately, a moment later she was the fearful Mina.

Mr Hamilton played Dracula as big as the mythical dragon and when he looked blood, he did so with gusto, producing noises which reminded those made by a Chassis of the old school "drinking" the shark's soup.

Raymond Duparc, as Helsing, was Helsing brought a touch of humor into the sterner atmosphere and his acting assured audiences that justice would prevail in the end.

But Russell's son worked. It was of subdued elegance and provided a sense of speed, much more, in fact than is available on the stage of the venerable Theatre Royal.

Joanne Whalley-Kilmer, Margaret de Munnich

The transfer to an Australian setting 'was only a transfer in name'

THREE SISTERS

RUGER FULVERS

Three Sisters by Anton Chekhov, adapted by Ross McKelvey and Ralph Goldstein. Canberra Repertory Theatre at Theatre Three, Canberra. Opened 22 May 1977. Director: Ross McKelvey. Set Designer: Russell Bates. Cost and design: Margaret Newman. Light design: Shirley Mudge. Cast: Margaret de Munnich, Martha, Janet Macfarlane, Irene, Joanne Whalley-Kilmer, Fanny, Warwick O'Leary, Dr Chumakov, Michael Nelson, Vladimir, Robert, Sam Farrow, Captain Serebr, Alan Hargreaves, Teddy, John Brann, Officer, Maria, Bernadette, Vincent, Agnes, Sofia, Helen, Olga, Phil Macfarlane, Fanny, John Hargreaves, Robert, Robert, Susan, Mandy Brown, Nancy, Jane Rose, Chumakov, a Doctor, Bill Munnich, Derek Nelson. Sub-plot people: Megan Donnelly, John Mackay.

It is a bold and interesting move to transfer a play, and the old joke that a play is never a happy one just optical aid has. There are all sorts of reasons for moving a play geographically, most of them to do with audience familiarity in content and context. I do not agree with the Rep's geographical transfer, that "the universality of Chekhov's observations of the human condition in Three Sisters has often been obscured by the play's specifically Russian setting" (unknown detail handy over obscure universality). If anything, it reminds us that people in different places, despite cultural barriers, are really just like us.

But the transfer was only a transfer in name. It should have been done more radically, more wholly, not just by changing names, references to objects and incidents. The more social content of the play has to make sense if it is going to work in Australia as an Australian play. This didn't happen in the Canberra Rep production. The soldiers of Three Sisters are of that unique Russian stock, "the superfluous man". For decades the military had been the repository of poets, poets-dramatists, and fulfilled philosophers. Taken to the hilt, their intellectualism and Byronic longing appeared wholly foreign. If you are going to do this, then you must alter the script to fit the local context, or not do it at all. And the situation of the cast, that is so important to the play and to 19th-century Russian life, wasn't presented here to the conventional. It was conspicuously wrong in the production.

While in parts the play struck a modered rhythm that is necessary in any production of Chekhov, there arose a glaring problem in the conception — or mis-conception — of naturalism here. The set was one of those sprawling extravaganzas that place detail beside indications detail without taking into account workability. Most of the latter half of the play, for instance, was played far to one side. At least this meant that the people on the other side couldn't see. At best it was a stiff neck.

The biggest problem with an ultra-naturalist set of unique decor like this one is the acting style it imposes on actors. They tend to pose and overstyle in that special kind of "stage realism" that is not only foreign to most in life. This worked against Chekhov, whose aim it was to wrench the overly laid naturalism from drama.

Strangely, in this production, the women didn't manage to establish themselves at any depth. This is sad, because the plan is really a psychological portrait of three Joanne Whalley-Kilmer (Irene), however, did manage to convey that special irony and sadness that is in the character and in those Russian heroines of that age. The other two sisters were too much like a stage personality. That, I feel, is the fault of the director for not establishing them as separate and different from the beginning. In the end one of the sisters, Janet Macfarlane, rode on a wave of individualism until, on the climax, she passed stiffly in the "weeping position", and all the nobility went down the drain.

The men were good, although the three of the balance of the piece altogether. Ralph Goldstein, a wonderful nervous cynic who might fly off the handle at any moment, Warwick O'Leary, failing to present some by some, Brian O'Brien, the teacher, warm quiet and funny, and Steve Page — all absolutely created that unique generation of misunderstood, alone, isolated amidst provincial ignorance, sickness with grand schemes and wild passions. And this despite the fact that, as portrayed, they really didn't make sense by then in Queensland. It is a tribute to actors and director.

The production struck the right tone at moments, but in general had an unimpressive conventionalism about it. Where the mood should have been quiet, remote frustration, there was often flatness. When some of the portrayals were lacking with life, when, especially two of the women, were two-dimensional. And the melodrama at the end worked against Chekhov's gift of leaving us hanging in mid-air with nothing resolved or a mood. The men were strong though. As if the play were in fact Three Soldiers.

'There is irony in the play . . . there is also a bitter anger and ugliness'

AMPUTATION

KATHARINE BRISLAND

Amputation by Jens Bjørnboe. Translated by Susan Hesse. Australian National University Press, Canberra. Opened 10 May 1977. Director: Roger Pulver.

Supreme Court surgeon Prof. Forthofsen, Ken Gardiner; Nurse Luciana, Marguerite Wells; Deputy Surgeon Prof. Heterosengen Wulfski, Gary Prechtel; Male Nurse Adolf, Harry Schmidt; Patient A, Morris Fagundes; Victim, Malcolm Sullivan; Patient B, Michael Stedman; Mary, Kathleen Hume.

Roger Pulver in Canberra seems to have set out on a one-man crusade to raise the consciousness of theatre people and theatre-going audiences to the work of some of the compelling minds in the contemporary theatre of which we are at present deprived by the language barrier.

A linguist, playwright and novelist, by one of those unlikely accidents of fate Pulver's special areas of interest in language and literature are Japanese, Polish and Norwegian. His own writing is oddly influenced as both by the three cultures and his own native America. An example is his early play Kamashiki, chosen for workshoping at the recent Australian National Playwrights' Conference in Canberra: it deals by analogy with Japanese involvement in the Second World War.

For a national translation conference held in Canberra during May, Pulver introduced to Australian audiences at the Arts Centre, the work of a stark Norwegian writer, Jens Bjørnboe. It is translated into English, easily flowing English by Susan Hesse. Bjørnboe died by his own hand last year. To judge from the 'local' descriptions available to us of the recurrent theme of social injustice in his work, the anger that informs it and the way he seems to use images of physical violence to demonstrate degradations upon the spiritual nature of man, one gets the picture of a sensitive, Stein-like poet with a deep anger against the new and greater injustices that have arisen since the time of the great Norwegian dramatist.

A glimpse of the gentleness of Bjørnboe, his past's pay at the small academy of nature, his humour and irony, was given at the beginning of the programme with a selection of poems from his collection, Notes, Wind and Earth. A handful of lyrical poems on the natural world is mixed with ironic statements about the good person life does a man, a sensitive-verse national anthem and a ballad of the North Sea in which a family, faced with the disaster of Father dying at sea, resolves the situation by poisoning him in a burning barrel for the rest of the voyage. Too late they discover that the barrel, stamped with the firm's signature, has been sold along with the rest of the cargo. Sadly they conduct a funeral service over 60 miles of burning, while on the other side of the world a Hindu is executed for the mysterious murder of a man in a burning barrel.

This latter social work is an introduction to his play Amputation, which occupies the rest of the evening. There is irony in the play, and grotesquerie: there is also a bitter anger and ugliness.

Amputation is a satire; the setting is an operating theatre and we are introduced first to Nurse Luciana, who explains the privilege in more far so. This is to note and observe at work the distinguished outpocketed Supreme Social Surgeon Professor Heterosengen Wulfski, and Supreme Court Surgeon Professor Forthofsen. Their job, we discover, is to "normalise" any unfathomable individuality which may be making untidy the ideal well-ordered society; and they demonstrate their "psychosurgery" method, which is the play consists of sections and knees in the groin, and finally operations and amputations. Such is Bjørnboe's view of social democratic political and political systems.

A fine example of that ideal "normal" is Patient A, Adolf, who is put through a process of self-demonstration and shame until he becomes the mouthpiece of his interrogator. Sister Luciana re-emphasises her ecclesiasticism of freedom when she and her lover discovered the erotic excitement of whispering subversive slogans to each other at the act of love. Bjørnboe's State, however, does believe (unlike Freud) that it has a place in the bedrooms of the nation and Luciana and her lover are arrested and their confession is Bjørnboe's anger is apparent, but it has the great dramatic saving grace of wit. His points are simple — how the enforcement of majority opinion is the corruption of the individual and how such enforcement can only be made through fear — and he makes them with the Brechtian method of repetition.

The telling central scene is a moving contrast between two surgical assistants who meet briefly in friendship. Their day exchanges are finally interrupted by her patients who demonstrate their own political and cosmological. The scene is concluded by the same ritual as the surgeons' interrogation of Adolf. In both the betrayal of language is complete.

Roger Pulver has a good team of Canberra actors with which to realise the play. Ken Gardiner and Gary Prechtel play the distinctive surgeons, Marguerite Wells, a most comely actress, plays Nurse Luciana, Harry Schmidt a defeated Adolf and Malcolm Sullivan and Marcello Offiano the teaching pair of assistants.

The production is smooth and fluid. I would, however, question Pulver's decision to raise the grotesque brutality of the original script, as he does in them, as the natural of our own surviving individualism. He claims that looks in the groin, buckets of blood and severed limbs underneath the operating-table and circular saw in the hands of the surgeons, we would find comic, ineffective and in poor taste. And I am sure we would, as we would find good reason in poor taste and second life.

It seems to me, however, that it is the purpose of this angry playwright to offend our taste, to trick us into laughing at horror, only to turn such as the implications of our own reaction. In this he has much in common with the post-war generation of German and Eastern European writers, directors, poets and painters, who have attempted through horror and sensation to confront us with that consuming path which was Europe's legacy from the Second World War.

Jens Bjørnboe's own life and death seem to bear witness to the artist's responsibility for that legacy. An excerpt from his novel War With Love America, quoted in the Amputation programme, is evidence of that view.

"This is the world that today that politics have no relation to what is human. The truth is that all our culture, all of European culture, is created by criminals, drunks, epileptics, the mentally ill, epileptics, insane addicts, homosexuals, or as any race suffers from subnormality. It is not the so-called leading forces that create a culture. It is not the skins and the gun teachers who create a culture. Moreover, in most cases, the 'illness' is healthier than the usual, robust healthiness."

"Just as life itself, culture demands a speech of nihilism and at least a minimum of nihilism in order to emerge just as reproduction demands a tiny bit of autoecy in order to continue . . ."

Isn't it the truth?

Ken Gardiner, Gary Prechtel

Playscript

THE FALL GUY

Linda Aronson

Act Two

SCENE I

Jack's Bar
Jack, seated at a restaurant bar, sees me. On the table in a bar stand three unopened glasses and a full bottle of whisky, in a brown-paper bag. A half-empty whisky bottle and a glass of whisky stand on the counter next to Jack's armchair.

Jack goes into a buttock-wiggling dance routine, wiggling his left arm energetically. The effect is far from comic. Singing between:

different dance routines. Songs, sweeping. "Good evening ladies and gentlemen." Not "Good evening, boys and girls. My name's Dancer, but you can call me Dancer. This is my brand Cool. And this is Cool, my own, best friend."

See strong no drink of another joke
Bell bottoms      ball-bottoms?
funnel? No Bell-bottoms? Tail-shirt? No
Bell-bottoms, funnel, propeller? (Pants)
Nelson, Nelson? (Joking on) "Close to"

Wieder: Ich habe noch einen ganz kleinen Hinweis zu dem Thema.

— if he'll leave.

Pause.

Gordon: You know what I'd do?

Sean: What?

Gordon: Get out. Just find your mate and disappear. Jack won't listen to you or anyone. The more you want him, the more he'll go for you every day. No, take my advice. You disappear.

Sean: What about Hughes?

Gordon: What about him?

Sean: Well, he won't take any notice of me! If he would, we'd never have got in this mess in the first place.

Pause.

Gordon (continuing): I tell y'what, son. If you can't persuade him, I will.

Pause.

Sean: Why are you so anxious to protect Jack?

Gordon: What's that gotta do with you?

Sean: Nothing. It's just that... I thought you two had split up, that's all. (Pause.) I've got my business. I'll go. Gordon: You reckon we're a pair of nutcases.

Sean (staring): No, I don't, actually.

Pause.

Gordon (staring): Listen, mate. What you are is Jack, son, is a drunk. A loud-mouthed, worn-out old drunk. Well I know him before that. I know him when he could get up on a stage and have an audience sitting out of his head, when he'd walk onto the podium, slide it open — not knowing a soul — and tell it himself: "I've got a job. You'll take him to a party and he'll have the whole crowd in stitches just pulling jokes over the air. He walked onto a room and it was... it was alive. You don't meet many people like that, people you'd... He had something, I damn... drive, power, personality — and it was just you like — but he had it. He had it all right. And I despised him." (Pause.) So he finished... burst out. Nobody wants to know. Well he was it. And on the soap-opera while I'm here. Not while I'm around.

Pause.

Sean: But... he doesn't want your help.

Gordon: No, he doesn't... but he'll have to take it. That's what he's gotta have.

Pause.

Sean: What are you going to do?

Gordon: It's up to you. I'm not looking for trouble. If you can tell your mate to stop, that... that... I'll have him.

Sean: You'd beat him up?

Gordon: I'll beat him.

Sean: You don't understand. Hughes doesn't mean... He got caught up, he doesn't know where he's going.

The discarded rings.

Gordon: Now leave. You eat your fish and chips and you go. You find your mate and you warn him off. Understood?

They stare at each other. Gordon puts out to answer the door. Re-entered followed by Hughes. Salazar. Sean keeps his eyes downcast. Hughes stares at Sean with some amusement.

Hughes: Well, what's that? The deaf-and-dumb Olympics?

Gordon (to Sean): You tell him.

Sean: Hughes, if you don't give up this idea of a partnership with Jack, there'll be trouble.

Pause. Hughes looks around ominously.

Hughes: Perhaps I should go out and warm up again.

Gordon: Come! back, bastard — aren't you?

Hughes (to Gordon): Well, would you mind explaining just what a little it's about?

Gordon: You listen to me, damn. If you're making a fool out of Jack, just remember you've got me to deal with.

Hughes: Oh yeah? What is it. Winchester at noon?

Gordon: The best thing you can do is take... your "friend" and go.

Hughes: I came here to do exactly that. As far as Jack is concerned, I shall do exactly what I please.

Sean (to Gordon): He doesn't mean that. Look.

Gordon (to Hughes): Listen, mate. I've got better things to do than beat up little people.

Hughes: Oh really? I'd have thought that was just your style.

Gordon (to Sean): You talk some sense into him, I can't. Tell Jack I'll drag him in a few days. (To Hughes.) I warn you, the longer this goes on, the worse it's gonna be.

Pause. Gordon exits. Sean keeps his eyes downcast. Hughes opens the new bottle of whisky, pours himself a drink.

Hughes: Hushum. The daily round of sex and violence. (Pause. Hughes regards Sean.) Well, I know I'd find you here. Suppose you're here to desert: pool old Jack.

Sean: Yes.

Hughes (tripping): Ah, clearing up after me again. Shameful episode last night, and so much terribly bad taste (in clipped, jerky phrases) "You see, we, in the movement, are not only concerned to combat misunderstandings about ourselves amongst the general public. We wish also to increase tolerance and understanding of others amongst ourselves."

Hughes finishes Sean's plastic smile.

Sean: Sean does a much better impression of you.

Hughes: Ah, you. But then Sean does everything better than me — so you can sit thoughtfully pointed out. (Pause.) Well, and did you enjoy your little chat with Sammy last night? That's where you were, was it?

Sean: I was straight to bed.

Hughes: Even better?

Sean: Of the God's sake. I couldn't face going home last night, that's all. There was nothing like that.

Hughes: Aw, come on! You can tell me! You always do. (Pause.) You coming home tonight?

Sean: I don't know.

Hughes: Well now, where are we? "Sean's indecision." I think. So, now we go on to "Sean pleading" and "Hughes' bluff" and "Hughes' graceless apology." That's right, isn't it?

Sean: Wrong. "Hughes plays the bluff" is usually followed by "Sean's explanation."

Hughes is taken aback.

Hughes: Well, well... well! (Assumes a prize-fighter's stance.) "Secondly away, round two!" (Hughes looks around Sean, staring.) "And it's a Hughes, Hughes on the offense!"

Sean (staring): Jack's game to get fish and chips. I think we should go before he comes back.

Hughes (staring): "And O'Sullivan is returning!" He is returning. That final decision is creeping in.

Sean: Gordon is in! Stuffing. If you're not worried about Jack, at least think of your own skin.

Hughes rings doorbell.

Hughes: Sean. I am touched by your concern. However, before I leave, I'd be grateful to know — just for accuracy's sake — where hell you'll be occupying tonight. I'm used to you disappointing people's evening. I'm not used to you spreading your opinion.

Sean: Hughes, let's get out of here, please.

Hughes: God's! I'm not moving till you tell me. Are you coming back or not?

Sean: I don't know.

Hughes (sneering): Well, decide! I take it that is some sort of burning point!

Pause.

Sean: Are you serious about this business with Jack?

Hughes: Oh I see, a trade-off. You or Jack. My feelings or the feelings of some other old drunk.

Sean: He's not please.

Hughes: Bah! He's totally egotistic, totally preoccupied with himself. What he would have taken for it!

Sean: Can't you pity him? Can't you see he's pathetic?

Pause.

Hughes: Gladly and pathetically. Yes, I can. He makes damn sure I can. He functions on pity. He sees it. "I use me arm, I use me arm." Oh yes, he uses it all right. (Shows himself.) His whole career is based on the fact that an audience will pity a couple. See any resemblance? Sean is even better at it than Jack, and that's what you subscribe to.

Seem (unimpressed): Look, are you getting with me or not?

Hughes: The above mentality? Sam'd be lost if legislators went through and attitudes changed? He's in his element. All he's got to offer's his bloody manuscript. (Chastely upright.) And his name's still Sam — did you know that? (Sam gives a note of consternation.) It's Syd! (A resolute creak.) He? Syd? "Aw, g'day Syd" (Comprehensively.) Syd?

Seem (amused disbelief): Oh yes, and what to tell you that?

Hughes: Never mind who told me, it's true. Seem (frowning). Just what is it that gets you about Sam? His accent? His name?

Hughes: Aw, get off and chase yourself to some village.

Seem: Or is it plain old simple jealousy?

Hughes: Look, do me a favour, Seem, stop trying to psychoanalyse me. Every time I turn you want a report on my health.

Seem: Must you?

Hughes: What, Sir? (And so, list of life.) Seem (disbelieving):

Hughes: Yes. Yes I must. Because I am vulgar. Vulgar, crass, bad mannered, bores — you name it. That's right, isn't it? Reg, bad (reassures Hughes: Well, for as long as you believe that, that's what I'll be. I've no doubt Seem understands me well, but subtly understands Hughes quite as well as I do.

Seem: So it's all a game.

Hughes: On the contrary, it's as deadly earnest. I'd hoped you'd be sensitive enough to work that out for yourself.

Pause.

Seem (angrily): What more can I do, Hughes? I've offered to reconsider doing the MA, check in my career. I've offered to talk things over. I've put up with insults.

Hughes (surprisedly): Ansel! Hughes (seems playing a note, playing a conventional rise, emphasising marriage.) Look! (Rattles his fingers to suggest hysterical.)

Seem: Well, tell me!

Hughes (contemns his accent):

Seem: Oh that up?

Hughes: Nope.

Hughes (angrily): Be what you were.

Seem: What?

Hughes: Be what you were two years ago. Seem (in Tarramoon?)

Hughes: Yes, in Tarramoon. The famous holiday in Tarramoon. That's about all we've got left, isn't it? Aw, you're changed. Seem: I'm changed ...?

Hughes: You're lacking, Seem. Since you got in with Sam and that crowd. Group therapy and tolerance and stone-ground honesty beat Christ. It's too easy. That's the world out there — not some half baked bloody tea-book.

Seem: All of which means you're pitiless.

Hughes: All of which means you're apathetic. None, comfortable, easy, wrong tolerance. Sociological accuracy and arguments on both sides. (Surprisedly.) And you're such a nice bloke you're all such nice, moderate, considerate, brave blokes. Make up your mind for once, can't you? (Calmly.)

Seem (displeased, amused): To you? After that?

Hughes: Care about something? Do you really care about anything — apart from your bloody career?

Seem (quietly, coldly): Like, for instance, you?

Hughes (bitterly): Yes. For instance, me.

Seem: (Comprehensively.) I give up. I can't understand you at all.

Hughes: (Having hoped for some sort of defence, is hurt, becomes frostier.)

Hughes: Only because I'm not a candidate. That's it. That's what I am, isn't it? Poor, confused, chip-on-the-shoulder.

Hughes: Well, I don't want your pity, professional compassion.

Seem: No, you've got enough self-pity to last you a lifetime. (Pause. Dryly.) You're the martyr. You're the martyr. And you know what's unforgivable about it? It's boring. It bores me to tears. (Pause.) Go ahead. Waste your life. Destroy yourself — but enough, that's what you want. But from now on you find someone else to watch the show. Because it's so fat without an audience — is it? — to witness the tragic drama.

Pause. Hughes starts, poker-faced at Seem, suddenly angry, jabbing, bawling, serious and then an elaborate rage that is as Seem's feet. Los and tell for a moment, then turns his head angrily. Seem remains unmoved.

Seem: Oh get up, you exhibitionist! (Hughes immediately re-assumes his death-pose.) Hughes, get up! (No response.) Well you stay being ridiculous and get up.

Seem (seems amused): Hughes rises but then Seem turns around. Hughes immediately drops his head again.

Hughes (disgust): Oooh. Oh God, my head.

Seem: Very funny.

Hughes: I'm not kidding, Seem, I lost my head.

Seem (seems even unconcerned): Hughes remains motionless. Seem begins to get moved. Finally walks cautiously towards Hughes's head. Hughes remains motionless. Seem begins to bend down.

Seem: Where?

Hughes suddenly focuses himself, roughly, at Seem, around one of Seem's calves.

Hughes: He?

Seem: Let me go.

Hughes (amused): Say you'll come back.

Seem: Let me go!

Seem attempts to break free, dragging Hughes after him.

Hughes: Now tell you up it?

Seem: Stop being so ridiculous.

Hughes: Say it. Come on, say it.

Seem stops struggling, stares, suddenly afraid. Hughes remains focused on to Seem's leg. Pause. Seem looks coldly at Hughes.

Hughes: Happy, darling?

Seem begins to struggle again.

Seem: You again ...

Hughes: I'm not letting go until you say it. Come on ... say it?

Seem stops struggling.

Seem: How can that make any difference?

Hughes: Say it, come on! (Pause.)

Seem (coldly): I'll come back.

Hughes releases Seem's leg, gets up, starts himself about, shifts contemptuously.

Hughes (bitterly): Well, shall we go then? Seem is at a loss for words.

Seem (in despair): You have absolutely no strings, have you?

Hughes: No, I was vaccinated as a kid.

Seem (coldly): What about Jack?

Hughes: Damn. Probably didn't have it as there he is.

Seem: Oh, grow up.

Hughes: Well, for God's sake stop posturing. Look, I'll get Jack off. Okay?

Seem: Is that all you can say?

Hughes: Well, what do you suggest? (With a look.) (Amusedly.) "Well, that, mate, you're the worst of a gooder pair."

Seem: Most you put on that stupid nose?

Hughes: Okay? Your cultural image is slipping.

Seem: Get stuffed.

Hughes (disgust): More stupid! It's at moments like that that I know he's over.

(Turning around Seem and slapping, very fast with a direct accent and an imaginary bang.)

You made me love you,

I didn't want to do,

etc.

Hughes concludes the dance with a lovely smile and outstretched arms. He remains fixed.

Seem (Hughes, I'm not playing any more games. (Hughes seems Jack's finger pretends to be a small white animal.)

When you've finished being so childish, perhaps we can talk.

Hughes: All right, what do you want to talk about?

Seem: You and I.

Hughes: Please.

Hughes: No more, Seem, please. I know. Let's be alone. Let's discuss one reason to thinking about us. How about that?

Hughes (seems to be going to turn, hesitates.)

Seem: What I want to know is. Are you going to pretend to getting involved with character like Jack?

Hughes (pretending Seem's delivery): And are you, going to pretend, with the mechanical intelligence? He?

Seem: Oh no. No you don't. No conditions.

Hughes: Damn, my hand! And to elaborate. A door alone offstage.

Jack (off): All right, you pack bastard, I'm back. (Appears at the doorway, carrying two cardboard boxes.) Hughes?

He is? Ah, you want tell you me what I've worked out? (To Seem.) Had to get bloody noses — guess a mile long outside the fish-and-chip shop. (To Hughes.) Ah, 'old bugga'! No, it's top-class mate. (Puts his boxes on the table.) Stop bloody damn. First of all they respect me, well as "Lugan and punkman, presenting the one armed bandit, Jack Harvey." All across, y'know. Then I come in dressed in these real gang clothes — maybe with a wig, y'know — and I start singing. (Singing and dancing.)

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

"All the men boys love a sailor, All the men boys love a sailor."

a waiter: Well, you know what waiters are? I've got to work on the dance routine, but just give you the general idea, y'know. Then it go into the gaps — you, I've gotta hand you. See, I start talking about how I lost my arm. Every night I used to pray "Wine-o God, make me like Nelson!" (He waits for a laugh. Sean and Hughes remain silent.) Well, come on! Wine-o make-o! (Pause.)

Hughes (sarcastically): Terrible. Jack: Terrible! It's fucking fantastic! (Gets drunk) a whiskey! Course there's still a lotta work to go into it, but it's all there, it's all there. Ay, where's Gordon?

Sean (shouting): He said he'd be back in a few days.

Jack: Aw, did he? Well, he knows what he can do. Join the bloody press! (Shouts in disgust, unleashing his anger.) I'd never shed it. Three times I had to tell the stupid bugger what I wanted. And they're stone-cold. Three times! "Me, no understand!" Pottery they don't understand you. Yeah, "No understand!" "Well, chance fucking our case," I said. Understood that, are ya, or no, warms! (Picking up the beer.) Tell y'what, I'll talk with the man, warm, set up (Goes out.) Yeah, "No understand!"

Sean: Hughes looks groovy at Sean. The following dialogue is radio voice.

Hughes: Well. There you are. There, given half a chance, is poor old, sensitive, pathetic Jack! (Address Jack.) "All the nice boys."

Sean: "Up it!" Hughes (to a waitress): Face it, Sean. Face up to it. Go and talk to him, give him group therapy. He's really such a pathetic case.

Sean (angry): Face what? What have I got to face up to? He really worries you, doesn't he — Jack? Don't project your hangups on to me, Hughes. You're the one who has to face "them." You not gay.

Sean: Sean begins to go. Hughes: Oh yes, you'd love it to be that simple, wouldn't you? Put me away under "insurance mascot."

Sean exits. Sean looks at Hughes. Sean (softly, quietly): Keep pursuing the gay. Sean goes out. Hughes watches him go. Cheers to them.

Jack (off): Ay! Sean! (Appears at doorway.) What's the matter with him? Get the fuck!

Hughes: A request for the textbooks, I'd say. Jack: Ay!

Hughes (shouting): Ah, he'll be back. He always comes back.

Jack (going out): Bit bloody temperamental.

Hughes is left alone on the stage thinking. Hughes: Jack!

Jack (off): Jack?

Hughes: Jack, could you do the act on your own, if necessary?

Jack: What?

Hughes: Could you do the act on your own?

Jack appears at the doorway. Jack (concerned): What did you say?

Hughes: There's a chance of a job on Saturday at the gym. I couldn't be ready at once, but there's no chance why you shouldn't take it. Jack (shrugging): Aw, y'know better? Why didn't y'call me before? What is it?

Hughes: It's a cultural job. As a dancer. Jack (crowning): No, he? I know it, I know you'd turn out lucky!

Hughes: It's not hard up yet. Jack: Well, is it up?

Hughes: Can you be ready in a half?

Jack: Really? Then, Jack: Hurry!

Hughes: I'll have to make a phone-call. Jack: Well, y'got an old phone, y'need better!

Hughes goes to the phone and shuts a number. Jack wanders around, shuffling and second watching matches of All the New Girls Love a Sailor.

Hughes: Hello! Is Ken there? Oh Ken, Hughes here. Look, I phoned to apologise for not coming to help with the poster last night. Completely slipped my mind. Did you? O. Oh dear. Yeah, well y'know I was making up for it. What if you think of having some cultural? Yeah, I've got a friend who's a comedian. . . Why not? . . . No-one. All he needs is a piano.

Jack: I don't need a piano? I'll do it without, no worries!

Hughes: Look, he says he can even do without a piano. Ah, don't worry, I'll see to that. How about it? (Pause.) Of course I am. It's a surprise. That's the point. . . Look, leave it all to me. (Pause.) Yes, I take full responsibility. Just get the guys on sound to clear a bit of space for him before they go off for their break. . . Yeah, that's all. Jack: What time?

Hughes: What time do they finish?

Day: Oh and one other thing, Ken, keep this under your hat, will you?

"Secret you'll run the show." Traffic. Yeah, he's using you. Hughes hangs up a phoner at the phone. Jack, his hat. Really! Come on, we gotta celebrate. (Runs to the table, opens the new bottle of whisky.) Crack the old bottle, eh? (Pours two drinks.) This is it! This is where the luck turns. He he! No stopping anymore, ay?

Hughes: No way!

Jack (driving Hughes a glass): To partnership! (Dry drink.) Yeah, I'll work that up. . . Tap class. . . What time d'you want me there?

Hughes: Um. I'll meet you at the gates at six.

Jack (Dazed): No, damn bloody again! frightened a taking on something new. No imagination. It's been Jack and Gordon for twenty-eight years, so when Jack decides to go it alone, it frightens the pants off 'em. I'll show 'em I'll show what I'm bloody made of. Here. what's the matter with you? Your chest's scraping the ground.

Hughes stares at Jack for a moment, suddenly moves into almost maternal high again.

Hughes: Me? I'm all right. I'm fine. (Crowning up.) Come on, show me that act again. What is it? (Dancing.) Tap, shuffle, tap, shuffle, tap, shuffle. Jack: No, watch. Like this. (They applaud.) Tap, shuffle, tap, shuffle. tap, shuffle, tap. Pause. He he. You're getting it!

Hughes (laughing): No flies on the boy!

Jack: Now your hands! (Changing his right arm against his leg.) Clap. And clap, shuffle, clap, shuffle, clap, shuffle, clap. (Hughes is dancing, clapping his hands.) Pause!

Jack: Hughes: And clap, shuffle, clap, shuffle, clap, shuffle, clap. (Hughes is dancing, clapping his hands.)

The dance becomes faster and more complex as Hughes and Jack grow increasingly high-spirited — laughing, dancing round in circles and shouting encouragement to each other.

Hughes (still dancing): Music. Give me music!

Jack (dancing over to the record player): He he. We'll have to dance.

Hughes: Tap, shuffle, clap, shuffle, shuffle, shuffle, shuffle. (Hughes is dancing.)

As Hughes dances Jack turns on the record player and selects a record where a woman is singing. Hughes is dancing.

Jack: I'll put on some. What's that?

Hughes (in a dancing pose): Take it away, Win-a! (As Hughes dances Jack sets the record on the turntable, dances the needle, screams with dancing.) And it's — clap, shuffle, clap, shuffle, shuffle, shuffle, tap, shuffle, tap, shuffle, tap! Clap, clap. Suddenly the voices of Jack and Gordon as youths dance out from the record.

Hughes stops dancing. Jack remains fixed. Gordon's voice: Is it going yet?

Jack's voice: Course it's going! Come on, the money's all run out!

Gordon's voice: Aw, I can't!

Jack's voice: Come on! Right — see, two times! (Singing.) "Aw, we ain't got a barrel, a money."

Recovering himself, Jack lifts off the needle.

Hughes (amazed): What was that?

Jack (taking off the needle): The records got mixed up.

Hughes: What was it, for God's sake?

Gordon: He's a pool! He sat you up. They're all pools out there. They laughed 'em they thought you were some half-mad old queen. (Jack is thunderstruck, whispers Gordon to Jack.) Please? Well, ask him, go on. Ask him whether it's true. Jack turns to Magpie. Please.

Magpie: It's true. But so what? I got what I wanted, you got what you wanted. You said you'd let me stay there.

Magpie: (moving as if to hit Magpie) You bastard!

Jack (gasps). (screams loudly) against Gordon. You touch him and I'll — I don't need you to fight me bloody bastard! Please. Turn to Magpie! And you. Are you. (Sings, pulls off the wig and the false nose, throws them on the stage.) Please.

Gordon: Come on, I'll run you home. Jack. Stay away from me.

Magpie: Jack, that is nothing, forget it. Just a crowd of kids, bunch of bloody queers. (To Magpie.) I hope you're happy now. Made your day, you little bastard.

Magpie: Ah, Gordon, you're such a hero, such a good mate.

Gordon: Don't push me. Gordon runs forward as Magpie runs back to Jack.

Gordon: Jack. Look. Next week I've got a date. The big one. Carly's coming, and he's bringing some mates, ladies from the show. If it goes off all right, it's the contract with Carly, for TV. I can get you on as the club, say, so they can see you, see your work. You could even do that. (then sniggering quietly) (Please. Jack nods his head bitterly.) Jack, it's all I can do. (No response. Sadly.) Well, what else you gonna do? Spend the rest of your life playing drag queen in little pools?

Magpie: Jack. Maybe I'd just prefer that — to working with you.

Magpie: (singing) I tell you what you'd make a fortune.

Magpie: (singing) Well, what else you gonna do? Spend the rest of your life playing drag queen in little pools?

Gordon: Ah, you're on the ball of a trout.

Magpie: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Magpie: (singing) I tell you what you'd make a fortune.

Magpie: (singing) Well, what else you gonna do? Spend the rest of your life playing drag queen in little pools?

Gordon: Ah, you're on the ball of a trout.

Magpie: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Magpie: (singing) I tell you what you'd make a fortune.

Magpie: (singing) Well, what else you gonna do? Spend the rest of your life playing drag queen in little pools?

Gordon: Ah, you're on the ball of a trout.

Magpie: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Gordon: Ah, trout now.

Mick Rodger was educated at the University of Adelaide and Balliol College, Oxford. He graduated with first class honours in English. At university he was distinguished both as an actor and director, which led to his training under the English ITV Repertory Theatre Trainers' Directors' Scheme. He then worked extensively as a director in English theatre and, for a time, co-directed London's Open Space Theatre with Charles Marowitz. For three years he ran his own independently theatre company, the Drama Theatre Company. The company toured into inaccessible coastal areas and performed in non-theatre venues to people who did not ordinarily go to the live theatre.

In 1956 he returned to Australia at the invitation of the Melbourne Theatre Company to direct the Australian premier of Peter Shaffer's Equus. He stayed on to direct Company's The Double Dealer (Shaffer's last) from the Sea and Sydney Opera's Alfred Arron Sargant. He became theatre consultant to the Australian Council, from 1957 to 1976, he returned to the theatre to direct The Crossing of Niagara, again for the Melbourne Theatre Company.

For the past year he has been working as a two-line director in both Melbourne and Sydney. Last September he directed Jack Hibbard's A Train to Minsk for the Old Tote Theatre Company, followed by his own adaptations André and The Game of Love and Chance for the Melbourne Theatre Company. He has just finished directing The Fall Guy in Melbourne and is currently working on a production of Wild Oats to be staged in the York Theatre at the Seymour Centre for the Old Tote in June. After that, he returns to Melbourne to direct David Rudkin's Ashe.

Mick Rodger is also a playwright and has had two plays performed in Melbourne and Sydney: Phenomena and The Double Solace. He has just completed a full-length play called The French Day.

THE FALL GUY

A director's casebook of rehearsal

by Mick Rodger

Neal Coward once said, "Never complain, never explain" or words to that effect. It is an adage that I have tended to remember, particularly when I am on the brink of going into print. When a production is working well, a chemistry often develops between director and cast. It is close and undefinable. I suppose it is based on a mutual respect, pleasure and trust. To go into print describing the automatic details of that chemistry seems like a betrayal of that trust. It probably is, but it feels as though it is.

A theatre casebook is usually objectively written by a third person: a spectator outside the theatre of conflict. It is a surprise, then, to be writing one's own. How can I be objective? I cannot, so I will [1]!

HISTORY

My first encounter with The Fall Guy goes back to the 1976 Canberra Playwrights' Conference, in which I was involved as one of the three directors publicly workshoping new texts. The play was given a public reading only; it was not workshoped (it should have been). Nonetheless, I feel sure that the play would not have received a production, or at least not as readily or as soon, had it not been accepted by the conference Theatre Board (Australian Council) into note!

When I first heard the play, I recognised its (then) unworked potential. I liked its pace and humour. I was particularly pleased when John Sumner asked me to direct the play for the MTC, for I considered that over recent years that company has displayed an impressive record in introducing new Australian playwrights and producing new Australian plays. I was delighted, too, because the play seemed to offer me a strong contrast to the work I had recently been directing (for example, my own adaptations of the classics, Order of Monks and Marston's The Game of Love and Chance). It retained the idea of working in depth with a small cast on a new play with an otherwise Australian setting.

CASTING

With The Fall Guy I felt that I already had some notion of the characters I was dealing with. Jack, the misdirected, ingenuit, well-paying, aggressive and head-mountain drunken refugee from the fast disappearing world of vaudeville, Gordon, his apparently hopelessly, possibly inner, probably ingenuit partner for 28 years, Hagley, the high-energy, cynical, vulgar, exhibitionist counterpart to Jack in a gay day and scene, and Sean, his quietly understood, "hardened" homosexual partner.

I had decided that Norman Kaye should play Jack. He was the original reading of the part in Canberra. I had found his understanding (even then) of the comic and tragic dimensions of the character and his own aggressive energy as a performer. Stephen Oldfield would take Sean. He had originally played the boy for me in Equus and I knew that he had a presence and stamina on stage which could identify speech between the lines of the text. Unconsciously, of course, I was already beginning to compensate for what was in the writing of Sean, which became more apparent in rehearsal.

I found the other two characters more difficult to cast. Eventually I selected Mervyn Drake. He had a quality which I regarded as indispensable for anyone to play Hagley: an intense passion as an actor and a realism physically on stage. It is that quality (shaped and developed in rehearsal) which has guided him each outstanding moment for his performance. Gordon was the last and trickiest to cast, perhaps because he is the least specifically characterised in the script. I needed an actor who could, in performance, be physically threatening ("The braver" Jack refers to) or warmly charming. Someone with song-and-dance experience would not come amiss, I thought. I found such an actor in Terry Donnelly.

DESIGN

I made a conscious decision to design the play as well as to direct it. I wanted to keep the whole processible until (after all, it was a very small cast to begin with). By designing and directing I could keep a totality of concept and also change the design immediately and painlessly to accommodate what the actors discovered in rehearsal. I often think that we work back-to-front in that regard. The design should identify

'Healthy mutual self-criticism and challenging of each other's ideas'

strange after a long rehearsal process, not be cut and dried before that process begins. But the conveyor-belt rolls on . . . Time and money seldom permit such creative luxuries.

Although the play contains naturalistic scenes, it is not in, and of, itself, naturalistic. I wanted no detailed and extensive rehearsal in the set, merely a suggestion here and there of an otherwise empty space. I am tired of elaborate and expensive sets. As a director I now incline much more towards the empty stage and the bare board on which actors are crossably sculptured out of light and then left alone to play their part.

It was not surprising, therefore, that the set for The Fall Guy emerged as skeletal, even cryptic.

RESERVATIONS AND REVISIONS

From the first time that I heard the play read in Canberra, I held certain reservations. In particular, the characters of Sam and Gordon seemed too underwritten. At times they were more "fools" in the comedy of Jack and Hughes (similarly, the end of the play, from the beginning of the scene in the gay dance, was, for various reasons, unsatisfactory. In the altered draft which I subsequently read at the MTC, various cuts and additions had been made, in particular to the end of the play. I still, however, found the latter weak. — and unworkable in its new form.

This second draft had the Hughes/Gordon brawl and the Hughes/Sam confrontation occurring simultaneously with Jack's gay-dance scenes. More than anything, I was afraid that the divided focus would confuse the audience's attention. I discussed the problem with the playwright, who then provided me with a third draft in which the various scenes at the end of the play occurred sequentially rather than simultaneously. It was a marked improvement, but I still had reservations. Ultimately I decided to go into rehearsal with this third draft and to see what developed when the actors began to work on it.

REHEARSAL

The following is taken practically verbatim from my notes made during the rehearsal process.

DAY 1: Monday, 16 February 1977
Production meeting in the morning. I ask for follow-ups on performance to create feeling of vaudeville and club acts and fluorescent-strip lighting over stage to contrast and give depressed air to interior scenes. I stress need to keep options open (particularly staging of last scenes) while actors discover script in rehearsal.

First read-through in afternoon, followed by discussion (playwright present). High level of enthusiasm all round and some good ideas floated. We begin to test an aspect of the play. Good start.

DAY 2: Tuesday, 2 March Terry unavailable for rehearsal, so we start with central pub scene. Good sense to take as random because we immediately discover character. I stress don't want to "block" anything yet. Let's just move through play and find out. Tackle subtext, and see what it suggests. Marvyn and Stephen take to dialogue immediately and spontaneously. Search for motives and reasons goes increasingly deep. Characters begin already emerging. Whole day goes much faster than I expected to soon.

DAY 3: Wednesday, 2 March Same process continues on last and first scenes of Act 1. Slow discovery movement through scenes. No attempt at stage. Agree to define opening stand-up comedy routine as a bit. Jon Finkelstein has photographed scenes (delighted to discover he's doing it), thereby giving it a context. Norman making great headway into Jack's drunkenness and cruelty. We also recognise Jack's vulnerability. Latent violence and aggression in all characters emerging and discussed. Energy and enthusiasm high. All begin planning song.

DAY 4: Thursday, 3 March We tackle long opening scene of Act II, moving slowly, asking a lot, throwing up ideas. We run (juggle) through whole play up to end of Act II, Scene 1. Discuss phenomena of overall shape and overall character development. We have noted a number of layers off the text, probed motivation, exposed what characters really saying to each other, identified where light and shade will be alternately necessary in mood and pace. Agreement that script is extremely peppered with stage directions. They are at least two months at this stage.

Must work out the fundamental from the fanciful.

DAY 3 Friday 4 March We extensively explore the last quarter of play. Unpleasant feeling that gay scene late play down. Up to this point everyone fairly enthusiastic about dialogue, characterisation and humour in play. From this point on, a feeling that the script changes style, becomes more literary, even satirical. Too tense, too cryptic. Not convincing any more. Long discussion follows. We measure alternatives. Wouldn't it make more sense if Jack was not cut-called off the stage by gay audience, but accepted, even applauded? What effect would it have on Jack? On the other characters? Only the playwright can answer that. We decide to return to working in detail on earlier parts of play while I contact the playwright regarding the last quarter.

DAYS 4-9 7 to 10 March We work intensively on Act I and Act II, Scene 1. As character strongly emerges, so we make joint decisions on costumes. (This is better than putting the car before the horse). The dancers are slowly (possibly at first) choreographed. This permits stand-up routine to be roughly worked. I am reminded of my own experience of playing parts and work against's clubs in England. Please note to have Murray (an accomplished pianist) put down on stage, in a stark, piano version of the two songs.

A lot of hard work in doing scene by scene, day by day. Progress slow but sure. I sense actors' problem of not knowing final outcome of the play, hence a loss of direction. No lights to be seen at the end of the curtain. But still a reasonable ensemble fed to everything. Healthy mutual self-criticism and challenging of each other's ideas. More two. Pub scene in particular takes on extraordinary natural air. Place of life where nothing is too significant or pointed. I know it's terribly slow and under-dramatic (wouldn't hold an audience), but it's the right feel in this stage.

DAY 10 Friday 11 March Morning Playwright (has been Sydney and gone to rehearsal). We run (skipped) through all that we have rehearsed so far. We discuss and discuss it.

Afternoon. We sit down and discuss, for several hours, the problems of the last quarter of the play. We explain to playwright our misgivings and criticisms, she explains hers. Could Jack be applauded by the gay audience? Playwright raises the idea. Very negative at first. We try compromise. My worry (and the playwright's) is that it might become another play, a different play. The problem, it seems to me, must be solved within the parameters already established by the text. Gradually we all collectively feel our way towards the truth.

It is satisfying that, immensely productive. It's then that I'm glad we've developed such an ensemble in the past two weeks. Everyone reacts with-out that not debated.

DAY 11 Monday 14 March The half way mark in rehearsal gone. The playwright today provides us with another ending. We move, run and discuss it. It seems to work and overcomes most of our problems. Involves use of scene (as also suggested by one of the actors last Friday). It is not lost on reaching a fundamental writing problem by production gimmicks, but at least it helps control burst of emotion and provides chance for continuous action. (rather than jerky, inter-cut scenes to tie up loose ends as in previous drafts).

DAYS 12 and 13 15 and 16 March We are now able to look closely at Jack's final monologue to the audience. This has remained largely unchanged from beginning of rehearsal but left unorchestrated because it struck out of events of gay scene. We discuss content and intention. Does Jack simply break down or is it a premeditated act?

DAYS 14 and 15 17 and 18 March is rehearsal, the resolution of Scene 14/light rehearsing scenes (also scene with you and the actors. They find it awkward. We question the playwright. Is the audience to think the relationship will break up or continue at the end of the play? The playwright wants it to be ambiguous. Seems to me that if they came together after their final line there is no ambiguity. We assume they stay together, I fairly tentatively. Book the playwright to think about it over the weekend.

Sunday 20 March Private revolution in tranquility. Three quarters of the rehearsal period has now gone. From making exceptionally fast progress at the beginning of rehearsal we have now regressed to a snail's pace. I feel restless and preoccupied. We're not so far advanced as we should be at this stage. Is that so many changes and counter-changes in script and action have demoralised the actors? Nothing solid to hang on to? Outstanding problems must be resolved quickly now, and irrevocably, if we are to be ready for an audience in a week. The process of leaving options open must now change to shutting and holding the doors. I decide on a radical change of direction, starting tomorrow.

DAY 16 Monday 21 March The playwright gives us a final version of the Scene 14/light sequence which involves mixture of Sam (with Myra, one of the two powerful off-stage characters of the play). After brief discussion, it is agreed that it incorporate suggestions made by the actors. I ask the playwright to desert us until the following Friday so that we can forget, temporarily, about script and on-writes, and concentrate on working up the performance as a public event.

We begin with a straight run-through. That immediately identifies where we are going wrong. We are too consistently slipping to register the "significance" of the script we have so carefully studied. Passes have become too unaligned. They are holding back the pace. The heavier aspects of the play are weighing in, down, the crump and humour have all but gone. With them the lightness and shade. Everyone is playing on one continuous note. No major and minor themes, no change of mood.

As technical director, I ask the actors to conduct a run-through at breakneck speed: "Just play the beat," I say. "Don't stop to think about what it means." The exercise almost works. It is thwarted only by the depressing atmosphere of waiting lights and the passing chains of an empty stage where the voices boom up into the roof and are lost. It shows us how much the actors can handle when given attack and speed. The inconspicuous pauses immediately provide us with our changes of mood.

DAY 17 Tuesday, 22 March. Back on the rehearsal room, I begin at the top of the play and slowly move through it, restoring and developing the comedy and lightness. Instead of shouting lines at each other, the characters use the same lines to joke at each other's expense. Immediately we have potential audience laughter while retaining the significance of the plot. Comedy is not freedom but the most serious way human beings have of coping anything. I ask Morvyn to play a whole scene as though it were throw-away, because throwing away comedy. The exercise works immediately: it is very funny, but also comically easy to hate to. When actors comically shout, it is not easy to hate. The exercise points the way to what is now becoming a radical change of direction. Underplaying becomes the keynote. Suddenly, as a result, what each character says becomes clearer, more genuine and thus more "significant" in the true sense.

Suddenly, I ask Norman to experiment with various levels of drunkenness for Jack. How drunk can he become without losing us or losing his own articulation as an actor?

DAYS 18 and 19: 23 and 24 March. The process goes on. Now it is a race against the clock. Will I have enough time to revise all the play in this fashion with the actors?

We take another look at the Sam/Hughie final scene and make some alterations and minor cuts.

I stress to the actors that, from a technical point of view, they should always try to tag emotional reactions and stylised responses together. To react, and then say the line, takes longer and produces more pauses. That in turn drags down the pace etc.

DAY 20 Friday 23 March. Despite sudden change in direction of past week, I sense that we all feel as though we've now finally emerged from that dark and viscous tunnel into the sunlight.

DAY 21 Saturday, 24 March. Final run-through. At the risk of mixing my metaphors, I feel as though we might have now come into the home-straight.

Production weekend. Over the weekend the production is helped, in particular, by a very acute understanding of the play's needs and a sensitive lighting plot by the MTB's lighting designer, Jamie Lewis.

Tuesday 28 March. The production gets an enthusiastic response from its first public showing. They are a preview audience. I have asked the actors to play it tight and fast, relying on their own energy and adrenaline to push the evening through. They are surprised by the intelligent laughter and don't have time to stop. First.

Wednesday 29 March. Post-mortem on the previous evening's performance. Our change of direction in the past week has borne fruit. Go into the second preview performance relaxed and more detached. I say "Play for every ounce of comedy that is legitimately yours, even at the risk of losing pace. Re-discover the play's momentum through performance time."

They do so and, although slow, the production receives a much bigger and more positive response.

Thursday, 30 March. Tonight we officially open the play. The two previews have taught us a lot: we need a balance between sight and light, playing and being confident enough to stop and enjoy the comedy, entice the audience and finally find the dramatic moments without losing pace and energy.

It's the half-hour call and I find that my job as a surrogate audience is now almost over. But the first performance is really only the beginning.

CONCLUSION

If we are to believe the critics, our peers and the public, it seems the final product on stage worked exceptionally well. But I personally believe that there are still flaws in the script. The characters of Sam and Gordon are underwritten, they are only convenient adjuncts to the protagonists. The joyfulness and aftermath scenes are still insufficiently involved within the tone established by the earlier part of the play. I am also inclined to think the actual relationship is too starchy and implausible. The play was made to work for those people who performed it; that production is that time. A group of dedicated actors overcome their problems with humour and resourcefulness.

The script is strong in its dialogue and vitality. It shows a playwright who is uncompromised but who has undoubted talent and promise. It would be a pity if such qualities were left unfulfilled. It would have to be a pity if the playwright did not re-write the last 15 minutes of the play.

Q

Two hearty cheers for an exuberant QTC production

THE LAST OF THE ANKERSMEN

RICHARD FOTHERINGHAM

The Last of the Ankersmen by John Fowles Queensland Theatre Company at the Grand Brisbane 22 June 1977. Director, Don MacLachlan. Designers, Peter Cooke, stage manager, David Graham.

Cast: Doug, Phil Myers; Harry, Johnny Johnston;
Paddy, Kenneth Newman; Tanna, David Chisholm;
Tom, Peter Kewels; Mabel, Susan Parr;
Molluska, Douglas Hedge; Tanna, Don
Crosby; Cliff, Ron Layne; Understudy, Warren Meredith.

Hi kids! Welcome to the WWI War, where the craggy William Holden likeness of Don Crosby represents the aging tank star, whose big costly disputes would fill a Grand Canyon with empty beer cans, and where a man's don't is as big and as dangerous as a thorny dingoo. With Sylvester Stallone as the new scrapper who's out to depose the sheriff, and a serious appearance by Bruce Lee who paralyzes Sylvester with a neat karate chop, even the day for old WWI, and takes the first place out of town when the disputes find out about his big payrol job. Don't miss The Last of the Ankersmen, on tour throughout Queensland and then playing in Brisbane (read R for language).

There's a serious point to that flippant opening. Ankersmen is a play by John Fowles (presumably based on his own experience, since the character of Mabel has similarities with his biographical note) set in the barracks of a mining camp in the north-west of Western Australia. Nine men, no women. The plot works towards a resolution which is plausibly silly and along the lines of my first paragraph, but along the way it manages to make a number of deeper thrusts into the psychology of Australian men-without-women. It's been given an excellent production by the QTC, which I saw at Gympie at the start of its country tour. The local pallies arrived out in the numbers of 40 were extremely male, and it's the sort of play that needs massive frontal confidence to give a necessary counter-balance to its reluctance of the Australian male mythos which such a milieu evokes. Such a point of view might well dismiss the play as the sublimated behaviour of adolescent male miners. As one who has worked in such camps and who now spends much of the year performing plays on them, I'd like, however, to pursue a different line of enquiry by looking at the play in the light of a reality I know.

Ankersmen, looked at from my subjective point of view, is not one play but many. The first act is realistic, delineating eight men who choose this life not making any showed comments on their reasons. The second act consists of three short scenes, at least the first two of which are patently irrelevant to the progress of the story. The play seemed to be moving towards an episodic mosaic-from-the-lives-of narrative. But in the final act the characters are blown up to the mythical hero and villain proportions of my opening paragraph.

However, there is purpose in such methods. In retrospect, the second act which I found confusing was clearly intended to involve us with the characters by relapsing on their lives, feelings and opinions in those thousand more intimate scenes, thus engaging our sympathies and

Edgar Wallace as Henry Carr, Helen Hough as Cecile Carrington

'A wonderful place to take your wits for a refreshing evening walk'

TERMINOLOGY

Age Group	Total (%)	Male (%)	Female (%)
18-24	10	10	10
25-34	20	20	20
35-44	30	30	30
45-54	40	40	40
55-64	50	50	50
65+	60	60	60

Interviewed by Tom Scoppard, National Geographic and Will Thomas, Lindbergh, West Australian Observer

18 May 1971 Director, John Wilson, designer, Carlson Machine

Henry Carr, Edgar Menzies, Towns Tapp,
Eduard von Markolsberg, James Jones, Gerald Hastings, Vladimir Jyck Uyuan, Geoff
Kahn, Robert, Iwan King, Gumboldt Carr
Judy Nunn, Cecily Carnallory, Helen Hough Nadezhda Kravtchenko, Manda Camran.

Pop, bang, pow, crackle, zip, swoosh buckle, plank, spatter, fizzy, thump, rattle, zoom, zing, tap-tap-tap clatter whistle CLAP CLAP-CLAP Exclamation
My poor attempt at an onomatopoeic word-gesture of the appearance of Tom Schoop's Forever at the Movies!

Still, but what else can one say? (The theme, by the way, is where the play falls immediately into a continuous tradition in the latter half, during a boring harangue by Lennox on the relations of Ari to Truce Notwithstanding Society — a subject on which Stoppard's Lennox is as unapologetically unimpassioned as was the historical original.)

In the busy minutes of this interview, Hillelson reviewed the film's production of Traveller, and made some very judicious remarks about the play you play. I find myself, after the Perth production, applauding literally the assessments of this piece of Shakespearean champagne for the theatre: a certainty in and of the most wonderful word-worthy senses — which is perhaps only to be expected when James Joyce and the celebrated Papa of Dada, Tristan Tzara, are so close-throated through a common parody of Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest (or, sorry, yes, you know, the other play).

In fact, a truly Westernized Hindi-Urdu who seems out of place in the Hapahto-Pamunese chorus line, striding solemnly across the pages of history-as-fiction, happened while Jayan, Tama, Henry Carr — Henry Carr? well, yes, we're coming in late — Henry Carr et al. mix high kicks and waltz turns with verbal gymnastics and patter of a most elegant kind and come up with an utterly new theatrical cocktail (the Singaporean frothy on the top, but packing a mind-awakening and euphoric punch).

However, there has been enough said by Bob Hill about the play for me to be able to concentrate on the Perth production. At its centre (the eye of the comic storm, the bottom of the whirlpool of words) is Edgar Allan Poe, who plays both (and in some) the ageing Henry Carr, whose remarkable memories of golden wartime years are blessedly recalled. There are also a matrix for the action of the play, and the young Henry Carr, comic potential of official and amateur actor, a dilettante and clown, with a taste for well-trodden (read as opportunistic) use of phrase. Most of us prefer both ways. But in the simplest thing is a star-quality actor as there is Perth and I can think of no one else who could have handled this demanding role with more aplomb. His excellent performance was complemented by that of Robert van Marckenborg playing the quickly perceptive of random poetry, the prince of the "last-up" creators, Tamas Farns. I wonder, though, whether Marckenborg's facility in French accents have led to typocasting — he's been doing his cheir and swanning us as for three roles as successive ones — from Sebastian in Shakespeare in Texas.

Gerald Hitchcock played a typically manic Joyce given to bursts of uncharacteristic timidity and bursts of Danish exuberance. He and Michaelaenberg participated in one of the high points of the evening, a scene in which Joyce confesses Tamsin on the origins of Dada. The writing and control in this scene were faultless, but the scene cannot be said of the ensemble work throughout the production. They play demands crisscross of attack, and it seemed here the scoring pace of the opening (pop, bang, pop, zap) that we were going to get it. But, as the performance wore on, the pace faltered (bombs, bubble, plunk, closed (sparks, flicks) to a dead stop (thump), stirred (travels), recovered itself (boom, zap) in time for a nicely choreographed curtain call (pop-pops) and well-deserved applause (clap, wheeee!).

The minor roles were generally well-handled. Ivan King's lugubrious butler "with radical sympathies" was a delightful cameo. Helen Haugh and Judy Nunn in welcome return to Perth played Cecily and Cressida, the "assistants" of Leon and Joyce respectively, and both delivered their parts with a fine sense of comic timing. As Leon and his wife, Geoff Roche and Merton Cammings gave honest and credible performances in two of the least satisfying roles.

Graham Mathias's son, dwelling on Henry Carr's elegant drawing room and a Jewish history was less well and generally ineffective, though I did find the elaborate business made of drinking furniture in the scenes of Bert's Divergence a little tedious, and wonder whether a sparer set might not have spared (Oh dear!) saved us from this.

The faltering in crispness and pace mentioned earlier, I think, is held to the account of director John Milson, but rather in defiance of "settling in" that the actors must have early in the run of such a demanding piece I did feel, however, that there was an occasional lassitude in the movement, which perhaps attests to Milson's undeniable talent for staging choreographed costumes. Being allowed a fraction too much latitude. Taken all in all, the Hole's Transience is a wonderful place to take your wife for a refreshing evening walk.

decorating the shelves. Not a single personal touch or relieving splash of colour enlivens the scene. The same impersonal quality runs through the production, and one has the feeling that nobody has dared to break the glossy veneer of the play and rummage around in the innards. On the other hand, a convenience here is provided by the programme note outlining the story of Parasol and presumably encouraging us to discover parallels in the relationship between Simon and his edison friend Jeff to be understood as that between the dead-alive Aristocrat and Parasol with his beating heart? The need is impetuous to beguile, but is it fool for thought?

The makeshift large-dweller, who attempt to batter down the stone wall of Simon's impermeability are chosen specimens selected from each field. There is Simon's friend Jeff, a boozey comic who is wonderfully staid about Australianism, Simon's school-teacher brother Stephen, who is aggressively down-market and metaphorically courts both death and failure, and then's strange Mr Wood, a study in schadenfreude, and Dave, a triumphantly awful student of the new generation, one to maintain a script writer who aims to transfer her charms from the friend to Simon in order to get her book published. In all this, as was the case in Barley, the figure of the estranged wife seems part of another, inner world, an intrusion and yet a reassurance.

It is perhaps significant that the most convincing of the men was Ian Scott as the student. The international style of misanthrope, blagging and studied unconscious transfers with effortless ease from one culture to another. With the other characters a specific Englishness is demanded that leaves the actors hanging between the twin dangers of parody and so-English relaxed naturalism. The exception here is Leslie Wright in the really bizarre part of the co-scholarship. However, being seen in a subway stockbroker is a previous production, one couldn't help wondering why he was not cast in the central part.

The women were less obviously disadvantaged. Leah Taylor made a splendidly selective Devina, who remained coolly glamorous regardless of whether her breasts were on show or elegantly covered, while Carole Skinner brought her usual intelligence and warmth in the part of the wife, though in some of the more humorous bits tended to sound hollow.

One is left in a quandary about the play. Were all these enthusiastic London critics seduced by a first-run cast and the far-farable Alan Bates, or is it really a very good play derived here by luckless producers? There were plenty of laughs, yes, but the stupidity of the characters lacked economy, and basically one felt only mildly interested in their problems. Has it come to us too late? Even the fact that we have seen both The Department and A Handful of Friends about the local taste must be the edge for us?

The only way to have at least a few of the questions answered is to go and see the play again later in the season.

'One had the feeling that nobody has dared to break the glossy veneer of the play and rummage around in the innards'

OTHERWISE ENGAGED

MARILYN LUKE

Differences Directed by Simon Gray. Playhouse, Perth. Opened 2 June. Director, Anne Newson. Designers, Anna French. Simon's friend, Herman Miller, Dave, Ian Scott. Stephen French, Alan Scott. All Golling. Ian Newson, Devina Skinner, Leah Taylor, Wood, Leslie Wright. Role Carole Skinner.

Differences Engaged, long-awaited winner of critical accolades, turned out to be a disappointment.

The mechanics of Barley are here reversed, instead of a central character lacerating everybody within reach and thus triggering the action, we have a central character passive and phony as a water-bomb. His cousin hits ripples of reaction by means of comic and quirky pederasty as conversation, but really he is the butt of other people's anger, fears and frustrations because he is so blantly passive he creates an emotional vacuum which must be filled with the peevish feelings of all who come in contact with him. As a device it is initially disconcerting until we have tuned in to the nature of the relationships that are gradually unveiled.

Simon, a publisher is clearly successful, and at first glances even happily married. He has planned a celebratory day of rest (intending to be seen recording of Parasol (even switching the phone over to answering-machine). He spends the entire two acts of the play being interrupted by a colourful assortment of antagonists, and it is their reactions to Simon that gradually create the figure of Simon for us. Even so, at the end we are still left with no images, and have the choice of regarding him either as a switched-off figure or from reality, or a disarming, apt who manages to transcend the world of human foibles.

The part of Simon needs an actor who can suggest hidden strength, even some threatening anger that is released in one or two unengaged and superficially trivial gestures. Dennis Miller is not a happy choice for the part. His style of humour is not of sympathy with the stonish quietness of Simon — one is constantly aware of the actor jelling his own style without having successfully mastered the unfamiliar mode. The dialogue ought to be crisp and flip, ball thrown away — toward with an Oxfordshire collocation — but here it is delivered tentatively, with excessive pauses it might be T.S. Eliot.

There is throughout the production a feeling of being at a sea, which extends to the vocals of Anna French, etc. The tedious three-part lounge setting is straight out of the TV conventions for the workingman's upper-burgers. No publisher would be seen dead in it, certainly not one who leans to Parasol's clearly unisex, as are the even-rare books

John Williamson as Geoff, Frank, Woodcock, Jack

'Williamson is writing better than ever'

THE CLUB

GABRIEL HILL-JOHNSON

The Club by David Williamson. Melbourne Theatre Company. Russell Gurnea Theatre, Melbourne. Closed 24 May 1977. Director: Rodney Fisher. Designers: Simon Gordon. Text: Frank Gallagher, Gerry, Garret Maguire, Laurie, Terence, Suzanne, Diana, Blanche, Hughson, Jack, Frank, Wilson, Geoff, John Nathan.

A brave man goes to the football and barrels severely in the middle of a pack of opposition supporters. A brave playwright writes a play about a club with a long, honorable and sensitive history and gets it staged in Melbourne. The football is Australian Rules, the writer is David Williamson, and The Club is perhaps the Collingwood Football Club, more or less.

Football supporters, fortunately, are not one of the more obvious components of a theatre audience, especially those closely associated with playing, and when entering the Victorian Football League clubs. If they were, the occasion would be rich for more participation. The football stories that Williamson has used are fairly well known, and the characters on which he has based them are as well. The real people, and what happened to them are about as legendary as you can get, but given the sensitive nature of some of their deeds it's best not to name them.

However, the legends of the game that Williamson has chosen have got away beyond even reality, more obscure. They are the sorts of things well stored in the football museum, both here and overseas. Locally, one thinks of Hoggood's And The Big Men Fly and Gidley's A Salute to the Great McCarty, which used the metaphor of the boy from the bush who kicks bags of wheat 50 yards, and what happens to him in the complex city. There are other stories, of course, the stuff of conversation in the pub about statistical facts, heroes, dares, rugged moments, games written by the Great Playwright in the Sky. Impossible memories that cannot possibly work on the stage, perhaps because in their original performance and in current remembrance they were on stage the working-man's stage.

In the theatre, for an audience that Williamson has obtained even traces in the last seven years, and which he knows better than any other person writing in Australia, is football it is a good place to hang his traditional concerns for the way relationships work inside institutions, whether they be a party, a college, a marriage or a club. As he knows quite well, the changes and methods and subject matter are quite dissimilar in any of those institutions.

In The Club, while it is similar to the Collingwood Club, with bits of Richmond, North Melbourne and Carlton thrown in, and while the discussions are recognisable to the cognoscenti, is not a play about football. It is not David Mamet's The Changing Room transferred to the Anzac. This is a disappointment to the fans, who will miss the real tragedy and drama of the game. This kind of play is yet to be written: that a club means that The Club will be able to play for long seasons in places where the Australian Rules game is like the Black Death.

The narrative is concerned with the coach of a club who has had little success in the past few years — got to the finals, but couldn't go on with it, lost the past five games. Laurie, the coach, has landed in his resignation over a full dispute with the president. The president, of the reformist kind, seems to be interfering with the team selection and expending money to out Lewis. There are other snakes in the grass. Gerry, the well-paid administrator is all things to all men, and has a plan which doesn't involve many of the people currently at ease. That's Jack, who has played the most games, won a few prizefights as coach, and while going on in years, still sucks his teeth into everything. He has a few schemes going too. What really got on the coach's goat, though, was the buying of a $60,000 recruit from Tasmania. Coach thinks he could have done better business, although the lad has lots of talent, he's not trying. The other players resent him. He's scored half the team. He spent one game watching a couple while the ball passed him by. And there's the captain, who is looking the coach, threatening a strike.

Loss of sympathies. Everyone is scheming. It's a bit like The Avengers or Freddie, except that the coach, the recruit and the captain hardly get their act together to try to beat the mechanisms of the others by getting the stick off the bottom of the ladder.

What it's really about, though, is a small bureaucracy and how it works: the shifting fortunes, lies, statements, hypocrisies, acts of principle, insidious, back-stabbings, all mingled together most craftily in the business play. Williamson has written for some time. Nobody is what they seem.

The Melbourne Theatre Company production, directed by Rodney Fisher with Frank Gallacher as the producer, Gerard Maguire as the administrator, Terence Donohue as the coach, Harold Hopkins as the captain, Frank Wilson as the old player, and John Walton as the recruit, is a bit under-rehearsed and slow but the basis for it is there.

One didn't get the feel of a football club very much, and perhaps the casting might have been more physically true to type, but the night was an enjoyable night as I've had at Russell Street in some time. I think the public will like the play, too. The Club touches enough areas of concern for the Williamson audience, and is funny enough to run. Good luck to him! He's got his territory clearly mapped out and he's writing better than ever.

'Real words from real people, convincingly performed'

YESTERDAY'S NEWS

GABRIEL HUTCHINSON

Yesterday's News by Jeremy Sealwood and the Joint Stock Theatre Group. Australian Performing Group, Pura House, Carlton, Victoria. Opened 20 April 1977. Director, Wilfred Last. Roles: John Long, Pickles, Sarah Foster, Richard Margalit, Gail, David Porter, Rache.

John Long as Pickles

Frank Wilson, Jeremy Sealwood, Harold Hopkins, Terence Donohue, Gerard Maguire, Frank Gallacher, Wilfred Last, John Long, John Pickles, Sarah Foster, Richard Margalit, Gail, David Porter, Rache.

Necessary is one of the most pyrotechnic words that can be applied to a person or deed. To be necessary is not only to be successful in money, but to do something merely for money. The implication is that one tries to do anything for money, however grubby. Doing something for money against men will on the other hand, is not necessary. Like working. Killing for money is certainly necessary, and in most cases immoral as well. Mercenaries, however often used in the defence of one's country, say, are not well liked. There is the idea that a country is only worth defending if you do it yourself.

Going to fight for a cause, however, if you agree with it, is not necessarily necessary. The Spanish Civil War, for instance. Going off there was an act of faith, courage, idealism etc. Going back was the least of it. If payment ever came into it. Mercenaries, in general, fight for causes they don't agree with. People who fight for causes they do agree with may get paid, but they fight for other motives. Angola, for instance. Many fought, but few were called mercenaries. Cuban, for instance.

Those who were recruited from England at mercenaries for Angola have been treated as scum. The old Colonel Callan has joined the growing pandemonium of 20th-century monsters.

But what of the men themselves? Are they "professionals", army men, staged, impostors, what? Where do they come from? What did their parents say? Who were their friends? What do their acts mean to the rest of the world? The Joint Stock play, Yesterday's News, as performed by the APG, is about all these things, and more — yet is so simply conceived and performed that it's like having a conversation (or monologue) with one in a pub.

Seven people are seated in a row in front of an audience. They, with one pair of exceptions, do not talk to each other. They speak to us. There's a machinist, who is equipped in a merely "practical" way with the "implantations" of Angola, no economic insight. There's the English end of the recruitment process, a professional who knows everything about weapons, fighting, survival. There's a couple of British army graduates, born in Northern Ireland, went in as boy soldiers, got caught up in making the first brutal. There's a woman journalist, covering the humanitarian angle of a starving missionary and family. There's the producer of a recruit and her and his background. There's a young kid, naive, silly. They tell us their names.

The seven of them take it in turns to talk, to explain themselves. What they say is an edited transcript of what they did say to Jeremy Sealwood, and the Joint Stock Company in England. Real words from real people, convincingly performed.

In the end the performance is about what life is like for these people, people like them. On the most violent images are not those of killing, but of the soldier's love for his weapons, where the professional describes what he knows about arms manufacturing, the journalist doing her professional thing by going after a story. It has the power of direct speech, of the truth as they see it. I don't think you get any closer to the truth of their motivation, the psychology of the mercenary, how could you when these people are presented as not unhappy with their lot, as survivors of various experiences?

Yesterday's News, in its simplicity and simplicity, is one of the best things the APG has done for quite a while. It is so easily done by Wilfred Last and ably performed.

The artist as victim of society

THE INTERVIEW
THE GREAT OSCAR WILDE TRIAL

SUZANNE SPUNNER

Two Plays by Barry Dickson. La Mama Theatre, Carlton, Victoria. Opened 24 May 1977.

The Interview, Doctor, Love Letter, Lustiness, Homosexual Society, Barry Dickson, Barry Dickson.
The Great Oscar Wilde Trial, Doctor, Peter Green, Oscar Wilde, Ross Davis, Prosecuting Attorney, Mike Hancock.

Melbourne writer and artist Barry Dickson has written two short plays which could be re-titled "A Portrait of The Artist Presented by Society".

In The Interview a straight three-piece suit man interviews a slightly jaded old roll-your-own "queer artist". Barry Dickson — in wit, the author. The interviewer (Howard Stanley) is seated deliberately behind a vast executive desk littered with the paraphernalia of a busy man, while the interviewee (Barry McDonald) commands a lonely chair and the yawning dawn at front of the desk. On the wall behind the interviewer there is a large Australian flag and a pessimistic picture of war leader Malcolm Fraser.

From the first appearance, Howard Stanley is a study in perpetual motion of the neurotic expressive man, a sort of Woody-Alice gambler who manically charmes people, lights cigarettes, pops pills, and looks frantically through his papers. When he finally addresses the interviewer, he launches into a diatribe on the cost of such parties despite artist budgets at Mr Dickson, or was it Mr Frickson? Throughout this blustering attack on his delicate sensibilities Mr Dickson/Frickson et al remains unmoved and unimpaired.

The interviewer's meandering frenzy is punctuated by a succession of garbled, amplified phone-calls from Head Office threatening him with banishment to the firm's branch in Ballarat. Ironically, though for no apparent reason one way or another, the interviewer falls dramatically from his chair and dies. With the characteristic nihilism of society to the artist, the event passes almost unnoticed by the interviewer, however, soon after, he too takes his leave and shoots himself, perhaps subconsciously realising that with Mr Dickson's demise, light had gone out in the world.

The tightly enclosed heterosexual world of The Interview is reminiscent of Ionesco's The Lesson, but the strength of The Lesson is the counterpoint provided by the poet against whom we can measure the sadistic cruelty of the teacher. In The Interview there is no such balance, since the interviewee (Barry Dickson, never speaks except incoherently in the "text" Barry Dickson wrote the play. A clever conceit, but one that finally sabotages the play, since the arrest never shows his cards, nor brings the phobic interviewee into his. The director, Lew Linton, set the play up completely as a farce enough. The interviewee was so crazed and the artist so nervous from the beginning that there was very little room for movement.

The Great Oscar Wilde Trial was more successful and argued, less self-conscious and content to amuse gently. The loose parameters of the play were the whiffing trial which Wilde endured in 1895 and which sent him to prison for two years with hard labour for homosexual practices. The legalistic formality of an Old Bailey trial becomes the excuse for a lively and witty encounter into the area of exposure of defining themes of sexual behaviour.

The specific charge laid at Wilde's feet by the final-minded businessmen of consorting with a young handsome. The range of moral questions considered includes, kindness to animals, and the winning qualities of handiwork over pornography. Ultimately, a never stated, as the tragedy of Wilde's treatment is evoked and we are gambled in a Wildean Requiem. Potter would pondering whether, if Jack is innocent in the society, is he a handsome-about-town, in the city?

Under Peter Green's direction, both the only prevailing control (Mike Hancock) and Wilde (Ross Davis) give precise and amusing performances that are beautifully paced and elegantly understated. The play is a delightful track in words by barrister and poet.

WEBBERS BOOKSELLERS

343 Little Collins Street, 1st Floor, Melbourne 3000.
67 2418 67 2559

DANCE BOOKS! DANCE BOOKS! DANCE BOOKS!

QUEEN & POWELL

Photographs by Leslie Scott
Text by Nicolas Brangoude
Collins $15.95

This book records one of the most celebrated partnerships in the history of British Ballet. Original compositions, describing the dancers' careers through their own eyes (and in their own words) and also through those of the world that has watched them. Many photographic portraits.

ART OF MAKING DANCES

by Donald Horsting
Grove Press $2.50

Max Humphreys's autobiography in art, a gathering together of her experiences in performance and a lucid and practical volume book on choreography.

A LIFE FOR DANCE

by Rudolf Laban
Translated by Lisa Ullmann
MacDonald & Evans $12.50

Laban tells of his experiences, thoughts and ideas, and relates them to his entire vision of dance.

A HISTORY OF BALLET AND DANCE

by Alexander Hince

Expertly illustrated. Ten full page portraits of very fine dancers, including a history of music, theatre and design, and a chronological order of the most relevant events in the long history of dance.
Barrie & Jenkins $22.50

DANCE IS A CONTACT SPORT

by Joseph H. Mazo

A season with the New York City Ballet — how the company works, from the corps de ballet to Balanchine and Robbins.
Savoyard Review Press $12.50

ANTHOLOGY OF AMERICAN JAZZ DANCE

by Gus Gonsky
Owen Publishing $17.95

The most powerful book to be printed on jazz. Divided into 2 sections, Anthology, the Jazz Dancers and the Jazz Club. Brilliantly illustrated with drawings and photographs and photographs to show poses.

WRITE TO US FOR A COMPLETE LIST OF DANCE BOOKS

playgoer has to be oriented to several things.

A play that asks questions by questioning truths, Barbara Cline's I Saw with my Love has women playing men and men playing women. Geographically we are shown the travesties of role-playing. The on-model world is exposed, the husband in subducing is typically ambitious, the story unfolds in short scenes, films, almost documentary in style. An effective strength-making piece of theatre, its strength lies in paradox. Created by Helen Cunningham, with a strong cast, light in an appropriate form, I Saw with my Love saw actors involved with their roles. With the on-stage comes a certain distance from the work and when presented with a supposedly small audience, for example the wife's attempt at gassing herself, it must always be short of believable and somewhere nearer graphic example. Barbara Cline's use of the stage and a good number of actors is a credit to her. Though you don't have to agree with the proportion of the problem, certainly men and women need a lot more eye-to-eye.

The first half of Max Cunningham's package in The Cripple Play by Max Richards. Written some years ago, the tale performed by De Chamberland is a controlled and winning manner, the play takes you in to the very small world of a 50-year-old woman crippled in youth and bound to a wheelchair. It paints her realism as it does her gentleness, the grin angry with people refuses to go on a 'coppin' outag, recalls her love life, the stroke. Her mind is meane and sharp. She plays games with herself and the audience, as well as tricks on the wheelchair. There are moments during her performance when you wonder how far a girl, she's an actress, all her words and events are known. Who is she the cripple?

Over in the Space, the Association of Community Theatres has made possible a series of plays, the first of which are Sharing by Veronica Swenson, and Gitter by Peter Murphy.

Sharing is a play without a set, only light. It opens with a bang to reveal someone looking dead on stage who calls a halt to the action to apply further blood in the appropriate area. In this play of an idea, an illustration of a plot within a plot, an actor will call for aid from the director sitting at the audience, the stage moment, a man a force. The couple, played by Julia Stokes and David Plummer, act out the hunter and the hunted. He shoots her by mistake — in fact, he does not bring down his great symbol, the deer. Another play of rules, of not-trying possibilities. At one point, as she's dying, the lights fade slowly. Julia Stokes never looked so good. Tight direction by Maria Christina made a difficult concept easier to accept.

The other play of the evenings by Melbourne playgoers Peter Murphy, was Gitter. Using 20 members of South Australian Creative Workshops, Maria Christina stages a piece of ritual theatre. Performed on a set that was too much an afterthought to the play's concept, the actors depict winners and the ruled fate of many people. Here the maximum is in language too big to suit the circumstance, bound by intent and cluttered by declarations. Often it seemed that the dialogue did not support the physicality.

Summing up a feast of provocative plays by playwrights not ready to accept the old ways as the only ways.

Much more than just a good show by Ruth Cracknell

JUST RUTH

PETER WARD

Just Ruth by Ruth Cracknell, Alexander Buss, David Williamson. South Australian Theatre Company, Playhouse Adelaide (opened 3 May 1977). Director: Colin Gough; design: Robert Ford; lighting design: Nigel Leung; music: Michael Fuller; stage manager: Peter Walker; stage manager: Gabrielle Bridges. With: Ruth Cracknell, Sybil Graham, Michael Fuller.

Just Ruth was just Ruth Cracknell, contraptions or dislocations, doing that most personally demanding thing for a performer: the one-person show. She was not entirely alone in this venture, however. To one side was Sybil Graham, at the piano, giving a kind of on-stage piano-bar performance, and generally round about was Michael Fuller the actor, who played her, somewhat and an occasional extra. Then there was Rodney Ford's on a small platform, a proscenium decorated with big show-bar paper roses, and all surrounded by an immense stretched-out construction focusing in on, and framing, Ruth, plus the lighting plot, the props, and the music. But after all was said, being carried, lit up and down, there was just Ruth.

She made a slightly hesitant start — it was a kind of testing the air for the audience's mood — before she took the collective hand and led it through one of the happiest nights at the theatre it has been at, at least this member's pleasure in here for years.

I was, in fact, a little transported — back to the days, 20-odd years ago, when she was performing in Sydney's Philip Street Theatre. The single-person sketch, the monologue, Sybil Graham indeed at the piano, and that sense of tension, offbeat whimsy and comment that made review at times the stuff of theatrical art, and nearly always in that theatre at least, a very good show.

And Just Ruth, at Adelaide's Playhouse was more than just a good show. Frisky, as a vehicle for Ruth Cracknell's considerably more mature, it was, good. She is a personality actor, a character in her own right, a voice, a style, a tragicomic sense, a delicious ambiguity, and someone with a sense of the high-trump of it all. Simply, at that level, given the right material, something good was bound to happen.

But then someone had the good sense — it was probably director Colin Gough — to go two steps further. The first step was the inspired choice of Sybil Graham as the musical accompanist, whom when a little more is said, and the second was to commission four "songs" written to write pieces for the show. Michael Clegg, Peter Vekich, David Williamson, and Alex Buss. Michael Clegg's and Peter Vekich's pieces for some complained reasons did not make it, but David Williamson's was there with two pieces. After Harriet Lane, Down the Law and Lady with the Flattery Eyes, while Alexander Buss contributed Folly, Monks, Clocks, Out. The third writer-developer was Ruth Cracknell herself. She contributed some pieces and drew amazingly and something about cover material wrong it, and the lightness of touch in flight some of the comic aspects.

In terms of the writing, then, it was David Williamson's piece Lady With the Flattery Eyes that brought the production to the stage of fine art, touching the performer of perfect lightly and playfully, not sufficiently strongly to break the mood, but enough to give dimension and substance to the piece and I, and thus the production as a whole.

The piece is a monologue in which a woman begins to explain to her doctor that she has a minor ailment and ends by confessing that she has murdered her husband. It is an intimately witnessed piece of writing of such psychological astuteness that it left the audience generally bemused, and let me say practicing and teaching psychiatrists to ask if it would be possible for the performance to be made a target for the cinema.

So much for the drama of the night, achieved as it was with taste and discretion. For the rest, the first was more solidly part of the ordinary traditions of post-war review, performed and illuminated by the lessons that have been learned in cinema and light theatre over the past 25 to 30 years.

The night opened with one of the old weapons, a number of choruses gaining her hand caught in a pot. There follows a more pungent piece, Fake Migrants, in which the lower-middle class, non-idealized, prejudiced and racist English migrant is subjected to one of the most viciously telling poems of Post-war-bashing that I think the Australian stage has ever. And about time, too. English migrants are as much part of the scene as we are ourselves.

The first half finished with one of the most brilliant pieces in the production, Miss Celestine. Sybil is decorated by an enormous picture-hat and she is the epitome of all the ladies you have ever seen at a South Torrs or Rose Bay luncheon restaurant. I think the sketch was an old Philip Street one, and it was appropriate, as the lady lurches from one discreet military crest to the next.

Other memorable moments in the first were Williamson's Miss Harriet, the archetypal sports mistress addressing a parents' meeting, an ancient cross-legged-walking in Joe Kester, the oldest and most cynical Queen ex-banquet in the business. Women, explaining all about the 747 you didn't need to leave, and Bruce a Vicky Madson, a 1930s women journalist, who, in an abundant piece in sales reporting an occasion she finds she has committed herself. It was not so successful as it could perhaps have been, or as relevant, a word Mr Colin George has historic endorsed a critic for using. But it's sure he would prefer us to that of the alternative content.

That possibly irrelevant soap aside, there are three other things that seem to me to be worth saying about this enjoyable production. Firstly and simply, what a pity it is that a present thrill. Secondly, its general content in Adelaide makes one wonder why the art of professional review, with its delicious blend of humor, satire and serious comment, has declined, at least in the English-speaking world. It is, as Colin George suggests, that absurd theatre, in a sense, took its place? It didn't. In Europe, traditions of review are still healthy and politically active on both sides of the Channel.

And thirdly, how much better could it have been had the tradition been maintained here and the techniques in writing and performance been thus further honed up and refined. It would have meant, for instance, that the delightful, precariously funny, and entirely attractive character who is Sybil Graham wouldn't have had to spend her life peering out Australian folk, but rather would have had some more relevant stuff to pour out here at home, whether the Fords thought it relevant or not.

Much to admire, but lack of thrust in David Williamson's production

ALL MY SONS

MICHAEL MORLEY

All My Sons by Arthur Miller. South Australian Theatre Company. Playhouse Theatre, Festival Centre, Adelaide. Opened 26 May 1977. Director, David Williamson; designer, John Cowdell; lighting design, Nigel Leverage; stage director, Peter Walker; stage manager, Peter Kester.

Joe Keller, Brian James, Kim Keller, Patricia Kennedy, Chris Keller, Ben Keller, John Bennett, Douglas, Arthur, George, David, Craig, Arthur, Dr Jim Bayless (Edwin Hodgeman), Sam Bayless, Daphne Galt, Frank Lacey, Linda Bayless, Lydia, Robert Kennedy.

What should an Australian production of All My Sons in the 1970s, seek to set before an audience? Can we respond to the tale of Joe Keller, who allowed faulty cylinder heads to be shipped out of his factory to the Air Force, and then manoeuvred his partner into taking the blame when the planes crashed? The play itself is inimitable from the world of the 1940s, with its antiquity of that pervasive disillusionment that sprang from post-war uncertainty, the alienation from family and society experienced by the soldier-from-the-front returning, whose restlessness and search for meaning new seems — in the wake of numerous popular and literary treatments of the same theme — particularly close to hand? What is there in Miller's dramatic workmanship of his beloved theme of personal and public responsibility that will prompt the director and audience to respond? Theme, structure and characterisation make no attempt to criminal these total dependence on fate, but what life the work out of the realm of sub-bourgeois pastiche, and how should a director tackle these questions?

Problems, problems and nowhere an answer in David Williamson's production or, rather, set the answer and would a spirit from a thought-through view of the play. The direction seems ambient, and it turns positively allegory: there is some quite unforgivable cracking in the second act which nobody seemed interested in correcting. Yet Williamson must have had some purpose in choosing the play, unless the audience was to receive nothing more than an experience akin to the usual of admission and satisfaction one has at the sight and sound of a smooching young couple. Kelly Rogers, or at the other end of a glass of vintage port. Not, of course, satisfaction to be received at that hardly complex.

Yet, given the lack of thrust in the production, given the lack of any sense of a director seeking the strengths and weaknesses of the text, there is much to admire in the performance. Patricia Kennedy, in particular, is outstanding. As Kate Keller from the moment she came on, the atmosphere hovered, the relationships started to come into form, the world of the Keller began to seem both real and relevant. Even when Miller's line, as at their most majestic — as in the final speech addressed to Chris — "Don't dare! Don't take it on yourself! Forget now! Live!" — the great firm point, missing weight. Although the character because of Miller's writing, becomes less interesting as the play progresses, she held the attention throughout. Yet never was there the feeling that she was overplaying, begging the centre stage, pushing the other characters to the edges of the drama. Kelly's best performance I've seen from an Australian actress, and we can only hope that Adelaide will get more opportunities to see her — soon.

But of her performance was the most notable, she was well supported by the other members of the Keller family. Brian James (of whom I have in the past been sharply critical) was far happier and much more persuasive as Joe, the middle-aged businessman, who can justify the larger concern in terms of personal concern for the family unit. It was a characterisation in a similar vein to his recent appearance in a Melbourne episode, and as the evidence of both, he is better suited to such roles than to either Chekhov or Brecht. At times, his authority as of the genre, may variety rather than that false grandeur which is the businessman's stock-in-trade, he nevertheless made for a convincing, and in the final moments, moving figure. And in the scene when he confronts George, the lawyer son of the man he has ruined, and reveals the young man's nervousness back in his face while doing a highest job on his former partner, he is precisely the right sort of concerned and single-minded self-indulgence. With just a little more attention, the quality, so crucial to Miller's view of Joe, could have been obliquely suggested throughout the performance.

Although Kate Taylor, as the returned soldier who finally manages to ask the question "What did you do during the war, Daddy?", was occasionally naive and uncertain, there was still much to commend in his approach to a character whose insight into things and our past might have become tragic and unconvincing. He effectively carried off the gaucherie and uncertainty in his approach to Ann, and the scenes with Joe moved well from guarded affection to warm and reproachful bewilderment. Excellent support also from the admirable Edwin Hodgeman as Jim Bayless, giving a beautiful demonstration of how to underact without becoming fustian or understating, and from a very well-controlled Daphne Galt as his wife. Displaying a good understanding of how to deliver her edge lines without integrating them, she made the character a great deal funnier, more interesting and more credible than she appears on the page.

Bareilly Vercosa was precise and colourless as Ann and Craig Ashley seemed to think that Miller's stage direction "moving" (of George Bennett) meant that he should peel round the stage like a perambulating case of hyper-activity. The set was the now-familiar garish mistake. Looking like an eighteenth-century Englishman's voice of a wilderness, it offered an unnecessary halfway, leaving wonder whether, a symbolic text that resembled nothing so much as a splintered wooden pole surrounded by a chaotic mass, the whole flamed by curved, arching posts. The effect was like viewing the stage through a fish eye lens, so dumb significant for those who don't suffer from vertigo or dizziness, and, usually, incomprehensibly perplexing.

The strength of this All My Sons is in the performance, and perhaps — to provide a partial answer to the opening questions — in that the play will have to offer the right of action working hard and, for the most part, to good effect, with less and characters who are still sufficiently well-crafted and well-motivated to strike several chords even in those who have become suspicious of the well-made play.

What do you do when your theatre blows away? Richard Creswick reports

DARWIN STAGES A REVIVAL

Amateur theatre is alive and well in Darwin, although not without its difficulties. The two amateur theatrical groups in Darwin before the cyclone still exist and have been active since the disaster, but both face problems with their theatres.

Carveragh Theatre Incorporated suffered worst at the hands of Tracy because its old, fireproof-superficiary corrugated-iron building was all but demolished. Left with a lot of floorboards and the partly clad steel frame of its proscenium-arch stage, the company bravely borrowed back to present the first post-cyclone live theatre performance — Richard Gordon's Doctor in Love, in what is billed as an "open-air" performance.

The dry season weather of May 1975 and the shortage of entertainment in the still devastated city ensured the success of the production. However, mounting problems associated with lighting, audience safety and theatre security soon put paid to hopes of staging further productions.

Theatre security was, in fact, a major problem even during the run of Doctor in Love because a tarpaulin stretched across the front of the stage was all that "locked" the theatre and it proved no deterrent to vandals who, on at least one occasion, entered the theatre and damaged the set with an axe. When spectators, desperate for heating, moved into the theatre's shell and the "two" descended, the Carveragh Group switched to theatre replacement and staged a very successful run at Jack Hebbard's Dumbbells.

Although the group's earlier performances of Dumbbells were marred by poor timing, attendance and perhaps inadequate attention to the money, it became eventually a profitable and worthwhile production that brought an entirely new type of theatre to Darwin. The combination of theatre with dancing, food and drinks seemed ideal for Darwin, where people are not among the most enthusiastic of theatregoers even at the best of times. In fact, so good was the public response that the group staged an extended season of private showings at such places as the Darwin Hospital and the Navy Base. It also played to enthusiastic audiences in a three-performance season at Nhilukway, the mining town on the Gove Peninsula. This success prompted the Carveragh Group to present the follow-up Hebbard play, Goodbye Ted, which, despite some timing snafus, was less successful than Dumbbells. Now the Carveragh Theatre Group is considering doing Summer of the Seventeenth Doll which is undergoing a revival of interest.

The group is also exploring means of getting a new theatre, but that, in itself, is a dismal enough prospect given the group's limited finances, the present economic climate and the present Federal Government's ambiguous attitude to the arts.

The story for Darwin's other amateur group, the Darwin Theatre Group, has been one of better fortune, although still not without its difficulties.

DTG operates out of a stone building, Brown's Mart, which, as the name implies, is a former shopping emporium, and has also been service as a job at station. Brown's Mart is administered by a board of trustees and is rated a historical building by the National Trust.

Although attacked in the cyclone, it remained structurally sound and there were most and effective means to have it rebuilt. While the work of rebuilding and strengthening the Mart to cyclone-proof standards was going on, the Theatre Group pursued through a relatively quiet time theatrically, concentrating on street theatre and outdoor performances, including an interesting garden version of Twelfth Night.

Samson Hapeman was brought to Darwin later in 1975 to work (with the help of local actors) and then produce a play which, not surprisingly, turned out to be loosely based on the bureaucratic bashing and red tape that surrounded the early stages of Darwin's post-cyclone reconstruction. The play was called Grouped and was performed to enthusiastic audiences in the open-air amphitheatre of the YMCA in Darwin. Hapeman said the DTG scored a hit with Grouped because so many Darwin people knew the frustrations of the central character in the play.

The reopening of Brown's Mart last year led to a revival of live theatre, with DTG staging a review — again loosely based on post-cyclone events — then a production of Rita Power's Land of the Anziesians, which drew wide critical acclaim for the cast and the producer, Darwin barrister Tim Pashley.

And it was then that DTG met real problems. The cost of re-roofing the Mart and installing the air-conditioning that's almost obligatory for Darwin, left the trustees without enough money to provide proper seating. Para-military officers, pressing the need for food storage and other safety features, refused approval for a licence for live performances. A family-run group selling staff friends at Brown's Mart was formed and a new way on the way to raising the $15,000 needed to bring the building up to scratch. But, until the work is done, Brown's Mart is out.

However, what could have been a major setback for amateur theatre in Darwin became a triumph with the opening of the new Christ Church Cathedral, also built to replace a historic building destroyed by the cyclone.

The original Christ Church Cathedral was a small stone church and its demolition resulted in an Australia-wide fundraising campaign for the construction of a spectacular neo-gothic-and-wood structure. The new cathedral, rising stark but imposing from the site of the original building, was consecrated in March in the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr Donald Coggan. As part of the consecration ceremonies, the Anglican Church asked the Darwin Theatre Group to present a production in the cathedral. A review noted, the result was the group's last and most ambitious production, Robert Bolt's A Man for All Seasons.

Finding experienced actors to fill the older male roles was not easy, but, to his credit producer Ted Whitaker, put together one of the best-produced plays performed by amateurs in Darwin.

A variety of rising on-stage appointments for DTG. Whitaker is relatively new to production but he brought to the position boundless energy and enthusiasm, as well as an unshakable belief in the importance of his own decisions.

Self-confidence inevitably causes some inter-production conflicts and it happened with A Man for All Seasons, leading eventually to the resignation of the set designer and the play's producers manager.

There were other problems too. Because the cathedral was still in the construction stage when rehearsals began, the set had to be constructed in Brown's Mart and moved to the cathedral later. In fact, the move took place only two days before the production began and the final dress rehearsal was delayed and after spent by other activities associated with the cathedral's consecration and opening. Despite this, the play was presented to capacity audiences in a six-night gala season.

Such problems haven't been uncommon in Darwin's amateur theatre world in the two years since Cyclone Tracy, but the fact that A Man for All Seasons was presented on time and with a minimum of problems in performance is a good reason for live theatre in Darwin.

Richard Creswick is an ABC journalist in Darwin, where he has lived for just over six years. Since coming to Darwin, he has been a member of both the Carveragh Theatre Group and the Darwin Theatre Group. He has acted in plays for both groups, most recently in Darwin in Land of the Anziesians.

THE PEANUTS PROBLEM

Can the Elizabethan Theatre Trust hit that elusive jackpot?

The headquarters of the Elizabethan Theatre Trust in Dawling Street, Sydney, has the feel of a place coming down in the world. The stock bars are empty, and in the board-room, looking north across Westmacott's to the harbour, the decorations are reduced to a bunch of ivy in a Schweppes beer bottle.

Jeffrey Jayston-Smith, the trust's general manager, is an exception to the impression of frugal shabbiness about the place. He's as spry as anyone can remember. It was he, the trust's head of theatrical promotions, Jeff Koval, and its publicity man, John Little, who asked Theatre Australia to talk about the eruption of criticism that followed the (arguably) biased Coopers and Lybrand report and the Peter O'Toole auction. The trust wanted an opportunity to present its case side by side with ours.

Robert Page and I represented Theatre Australia. We were disappointed by unexplained stipulations from Jayston-Smith that he would not discuss trust policy (that was for the board, he said) and that he would, in general, be willing to be quoted only on the trust's entrepreneurial role. It was a blow softened by a promise that emerged later in the afternoon that Theatre Australia will be given an interview when the Coopers and Lybrand management consultants' report is verified, and all the issues can be discussed and all questions about the trust answered.

But in any case, the entrepreneurial activities of the trust require immediate examination. The central recommendation of the Coopers report is that business of the trust be purely financial, leaving it with only a national entrepreneurial role. Foreign loans and interstate tours. An examination of their trust's skills in that field is a first priority.

"It is not an aphorism or platitude in the world — it doesn't matter how often — if it can put us back to it to the Australian public, if the quality is there," said Jayston-Smith. "And an endeavour to present Australian companies as widely as possible within the funds available, provided the quality is there."

But the trust has only peanuts to play with. In 1975 it allocated itself an entrepreneurial fund of $44,000, but in 1976 this was cut to $21,000. It is not much more than half the general managers' salary. Instead of allocating resources for the job the trust made the decision to move them, and in pursuit of cash in the last 12 months, it invested in three holiday shows, two Broadway shows, and the shows imported through the Sydney Theatre Royal — starting with Dead End Decks (Peter O'Toole) and continuing with The Top of the Third Hump (Hump), The Perverse of the Company (Douglas Fairbanks Jr) and Private Theatre (Lipson).

To suggest now that the shows at the Theatre Royal were poor-quality goods, that they're damaged Australian lights internationally and that they've failed to make much money, the trust replies in much the way Jeff Koval did that afternoon: "There is the box-office potential — the potential is there to make $10,000, $40,000, $50,000." The trust seems to have been banking on a jackpot.

Marr: Does the trust believe it's free to raise its money any way it can?

Jayston-Smith: Yes, I think so. Subject to any qualifications we would like to make ourselves in the way we do it. I wouldn't suggest it could be used in a greyhound. But, provided it's within the general parameters of the arts world, it is.

Marr: Does the trust feel free to invest, even though the activities it becomes associated with are working contrary to what appear to be its own objectives?

Jayston-Smith: I would think the trust itself would have to determine whether it is going to be working contrary to its objectives, and if it is, I don't imagine that we wouldn't place a restriction on a consultant.

Little: May I come in? By whose objectives? Who says what the objectives are?

David Marr

DAVID MARR is an ex-stroke graduate of Sydney University, where he was very active domestically. Having decided not to pursue a legal career, he spent two years in Europe among poets and bohemians. On his return he worked for three years on the Observer and Guardian and directed his first play, It's over on the corner, in 1976. He now edits the Play pages of the Saturday Times.

We were posing the problem of Dead End Decks. It has been exhaustively discussed in the press, but the trust's rationale for involvement in that ill-fortuned, unsuccessful venture remains at the heart of any public account, and the public defense of the trust's entrepreneurial role. "More. It seems hard to square the impact of shows such as Dead End (which won the development of indigenous theatre) Jarvis-Smith. Possibly... yes, on that particular one... but on paper it had as much — let's call it "quality appeal" — as far as we were concerned as any of the activities from overseas: the Royal Shakespeare Company or anything else."

Russell It has to be one of the best casts, on paper, that's ever been seen in Australia on stage at one time. The actual product did not live up to the people on stage. I don't think that can be entered.

Jarvis-Smith We certainly believed [O'Toole's standing in world theatre] was high when we arranged to do it. But I think that if that is considered to be a bad apple in the basket, and again that is a matter of opinion, I don't think the apple was anywhere near as bad by the time the show finished as possibly the time it opened. But going back, as I did this morning, over the shows we've done in the last seven years, I think that is really, by picking O'Toole the exception because it goes along with a not having critical acclaim.

Warr Who from the Australian Elizabethan Theatre Trust saw Dead End (which) performing in the provinces of England?

Jarvis-Smith Nobody.

Warr Who from the trust read the script?

Jarvis-Smith Nobody.

Warr Who from the trust employed an independent ratings agency to see what the reviews had been?

Jarvis-Smith Nobody... But I did say if there is any dissatisfaction with our current situation with Dead End (which), it is that it is one of the worst decisions, I believe, where we haven't had the quality control which we've always believed in, viz. — being able to judge the product from the studio or the script or whatever it happens to be — and that we did not have that in the O'Toole situation. As agreed that the O'Toole situation was something where I had to make up my mind within two days, as did the board. It was just one of those odd things. Now, if it was a mistake, and we're just as capable of making mistakes as anybody else — I like to think we don't make too many — but if it was a mistake, it was a mistake. And I'm certainly not prepared to defend the board and hence what can be considered a mistake and that's a matter of opinion at the time.

Russell I think the word mistake is being used too much. The public didn't necessarily think it was a mistake, the critics certainly did, but the public didn't. "More" that the public did I mean, as a commercial undertaking it failed.

Russell As a commercial undertaking, certainly, yes, you're right, it failed. But the public, that went to see it basically enjoyed the production very much.

Warr You say this venture was a "force off"? Is there a policy now that such a venture won't be entered into again? Has a lesson been learned?

Jarvis-Smith If there is a lesson to be learned, quality. You must be able to check your quality, or to know that if comes from a quality studio. And that we did not have the opportunity to do, except we did get some overseas sources as quickly as we could.

Russell Which were good.

Warr You didn't also get the critical slatberage from the English provinces did you?

Russell We were given what we were told were the critics from the provinces where they'd played.

Page On a point of information, were those full clippings?

Russell Absolutely, complete from beginning to end, which you can see.

The trust hasn't struck the jackpot with the Theatre Royal series, over the four productions, it thinks it will come out "a bit up or a bit down." But the trust is ahead when you add up the results of commercial investment over the last seven years says Jarvis-Smith. "We have not actually spent in the net, one dollar of government money on commercial investment. And that money has been used to pick up the losses on most of these other shows. It probably sounds like an accounting year one, but that's got to be done at some stage."

Any loss the trust shows on a quarterly and investment, he points out, is limited by law on O'Toole to plus or slightly more than $2,000. "At all times, we restrict the amount [of the entrepreneurial fund] which can be used up, the amount of loss which we can incur in a commercial investment."

But is there the trust won't publish these figures, which are about to go on the records for Jarvis-Smith explained. "If Mr. Hooley makes a profit or a loss, that's his business, and the same with J.C. Williamson's, and therefore we have taken a little bit off, I think perhaps, someone that if we publish on our accounts which particular shows [of theirs] we lost money on as commercial investments and which we didn't, we are going along the information of the accounts of individuals on taxpayers." The figures will be given, in confidence, only to the Australian Council. "More. I've been fascinated by the trust's [ambivalent] attitude to having internal share companies. I can't think of a better function for the trust than breaking down the patched barriers between city and games in Australia."

Jarvis-Smith Right. I support that.

but I went through our annual reports, which is the best way I can refresh my memory, to see the results of the interstate drama companies that we raised since we started the programme in 1970, and every one of them did not break even, every one of them lost money. So therefore I believe one cannot approach a court by an Australian drama company, on the basis that it's not going to break even. Now, I'm not suggesting for a moment that one shouldn't still keep bringing them, because we're doing it, and we've got Tamara's Tamara's at the moment going into Melbourne and Brisbane. But you do it with the knowledge, surely the financial knowledge, that you are not going to break even at the best.

Mare: Can these courts be purposefully discussed in terms of "breaking even", in terms of cash? Aren't we getting right to the heart of what subverted the initial engineering of it, and isn't that precisely the nature of something like the trust?

Joyce-Smith: Yes.

Mare: Well, now, surely you can point to a great success, a tour of Red Shoes to Sydney, even if a later success?

Joyce-Smith: Yes, certainly.

Karel: But this is the very point why we say we must have other involvements because our involvements in more commercial theatre will enable us to do that more and more. But you can only lose so much money on an interstate company, and then the money runs out. So you can't do any more, because you haven't got any more.

Papa: We are concerned with your public image in Australia. Your public image at the moment looks to us rather bad and we're trying to discover why it is bad. We think it's because you bring in overseas shows on the ground that there's then supposed to be money for indigenous shows, but when the figures come out you're a little up or a little down. It hasn't happened. Karel: Just a second. I think, in lieu of we go back over our figures, our investors have in fact shown profits over the past years. You're making three answers at the moment.

It's an aspect of what might be called the greatest problem the trust still has: a national mission but allocated peanuts to realise it. A confusion of attitudes is thus probably unavoidable: with one set of principles in place (as Australian theatre, and a theatre (frequently contradictory) set to raise the cash to do it. The way out of the bind is for the trust to bid a commercial jackpot — but the jackpot never seems to come.

If the Elizabethan Trust becomes the nation's official entrepreneur, it will have as a guiding principle of the business (in graphics on the walls of their new and inevitably more modest offices) "Bake your own". There is no limit on the love the trust associates an inter-state, non-commercial tour at the moment. The trust has never broken even. It is very cautious.

Joyce-Smith: is an fundamental disagreement with Wilton Morley (see Morley's article in the June issue of Theatre Australia) over the prospects of taking critical and commercial loss from subsidised theatre and turning them successfully. You must bake your time, turn the trust, give publicity and marketing a chance, wait for theatres that are just right for the show. The trust has turned down many possibilities to follow this principle, and a right to right, but in seven years it hasn't broken even on an interstate production.

In private, others at the trust wonder if an entrepreneur can work within the structure of committees and boards imposed in Douglas Smith, and lately the trust has not had much success securing the prizes it has been after. It lost Gordon Chater and Benjamin Franklin to Wilton Morley, yet, aggravating as it is for the trust, Morley appears to have got Chater on just about all terms the trust was fighting the National for.

By a series of internal organisations the administration of the Playwright's Conference came under the trust's entrepreneurial budget. No longer. In a general administrative budget of $250,000 there was not the money to help them any longer and they were axed this year. Joyce-Smith: I spoke to Jacques Kott and said, "Well, look, if you're interested in so understanding this sort of problem, I'm sure we can find a bibliography downstairs where you can bring your files in and get a filing cabinet and if you want, someone to do your minutes of meetings and that sort of thing and send them out."

"and they away we went. And ultimately we finished up by the time of the last conference, it was one person literally full-time downstairs for at least four months of the year, just asking for an assistant. In the end it was just not possible."

A small but highly significant boost to the nation's theatre was cut off, metaphorically. In its three original decades of policy often as hard to understand, and frequently as damaging to the public image of the trust, that Theatre Australia will examine in a second interview with the trust. With the results of the Cooper and Lybrand report known, the trust will be in a position to say where it goes now after these (as Jeff Karel calls them) two "interim years" since it lost the agents and balls.

B

Giselle saves the season

'Never has the feel and smell of classic French ballet been so real'

Marlene Brown/Giselle

For some people this year's Sydney season of the Australian Ballet has been a disappointment.

"It's under-nourished," they say. "Not enough substance." Others have said there was too much "technical" and not enough entertainment. On the one hand, the season has been too experimental, and on the other, not experimental enough.

Well, for a start, the season is far from being short: there is enough strong choreography, with Serenade, Schwansee and Rapinade. And it is filled at least two or three other full-length ballets.

But the future Sydney audience do not want compassion, pity and emotion; the future Sydney audience want a full length ballet with lots of costumes, sets and a nice story... putting ballet on a par with the Australian Opera, which we all know hardly ever puts its nose around the door into the 20th century.

One would have thought by now that these people had realised the essential difference in both content and manner of association between ballet and theatre/opera. Ballet dance, whatever you want to call it, can, if it wants to, add a new dimension to story-telling, but it can be "silent" nothing at all except itself, if it wants to.

Such a proposition is well compounded in Balanchine's masterpiece Serenade. Serenade is purely itself. Its language is its inner and complete. It is about nothing else but dance. It's the art of work that always challenges an audience's imagination, it forces the audience to follow its argument and add drama if they feel so inclined.

Sydney audiences don't like to exert themselves, therefore, the most commonly heard descriptions of this work are "too busy", "confused" and "a lot of useless wandering about." I am surely tempted to say that words.

Now, I grant that the performance of this ballet by the dancers of the company is not the best, and that the conductor, Alan Baxter, gave them no help whatsoever, but still cannot these people see the sublime logic, the restrained, unified emotion, the beauty and the exquisite mathematical of this work?

I can see why Balanchine is so wary of having his works performed by companies other than his own New York City Ballet. This company has been created solely by himself, his entire philosophy of the dance is personified in its dancers. They have to be light, quick, long and leggy, chic, and totally trained to make his density of conception seem effortless and simple.

The Australian Ballet dancers have practically none of these qualities. On the opening night, Serenade was marred by spoiled lines, slow and sloppy movements and a general ignorance of the geometry that makes it.

Precise accuracy is needed here. With entire corps de ballet entries intertwining, with trues, solos and duets that start and end within the covered path of the music, the team simply must go like clockwork, one had moment and the future is irrevocably lost. With our dancers, the humour, the confusion, the money and partly limited enthusiasm made this beautiful great and a burning, boring dance class.

I thought that maybe the soloists would save the performance, but when Marlene Brown and Marilyn James went into their show, supported full to the ground with Kelvin Cui as the so-called "Angel of Death", true, and full as their backdrop with an audible bang — that was the end.

I can see the point of having the work in the repertoire: no company should be without it, it is an apt test of pure dance technique in any dancer. But, the performance does show that Miss Williams will still have an uphill climb to get this company to the standard of any other internationally known ballet company.

When it came to the second work on the third programme, my husband was disappointed any by the twenty dance-bath collaborations of John Butler's Sebastian. This work has dated faster than James Dale and is just another reputation of Butler's usual borough over-masculine, over-sexed, "grab-bag-and-queue-the-ally" choreography.

Unlike Sebastian's Butler, Sebastian has no affinity with its theme. It goes on over-blown way despite whatever piece of music is playing at the time. It's just the same with Caravan Sharon Lee (Norm and After Zane). But here, of course, the Australian Ballet's dancers were more at home. If you did a waltz wrongly or didn't do one at all, — well just throw your crutch out a little more and no one will notice.

Marilyn Rowe, in the lead part, looked downright embarrassed in all the fogged-up goings-on in this short drama of forbidden love, decadence, lust and witchcraft. And Alia Adler, as Sebastian, looked perplexed and dazed throughout, probably worrying about his body make-up rubbing off on everyone else as he waltzes.

With the last part of this programme, Reveries. Act 3, things improved a little. Here, in the Polka workshop, the dancing was fiery, heroic, well poised and arranged — everything it should be.

There was a poor excuse for a set and once again little help coming from the conductor, but the group work, the pose and chore and solos were done with gusto and enthusiasm. It's a totally needless piece of choreography though one of these working celebrations that remind of so many 19th-century Polka works with a bang. And, it hardly needs to be said, part the worst of things that an over-enthusiastic over-entertained audience loves — no effort required.

But the theatre still had an ace up its sleeve, the von Fraugh reconstruction of the Coralli-Petrossi classic, Gaufré.

Van Fraugh won the Grand Prix de Paris for this interpretation and one can see why. Never has the feel and smell of classic French ballet been so real. Never has the explicit drama of this little ballet been crossed by a philosophical price been so palpable.

Van Fraugh has translated a lot of the original movement for the lead part, danced with exquisite restraint, freshness and clarity by Marilyn Rowe. Yet she has interpreted a few extra bits of dancing for the Prince and for the peasants, using some of the basic archaic gestures of Cochet, but always with a view to strengthening the period flavor, so that some of the movement in both the first and second acts look as if they have just stepped out of those mid-19th-century lithographs by Delacroix.

It is a superb interpretation. The dancers know this, and throughout the season it was danced with masterful awareness.

If the dancers can bring this same awareness of technique and poetic application to Wuthers' new production of Swan Lake later this year, the Australian Ballet will have another masterpiece to treasure in its repertoire. ■

Going Home

'... it is remarkably valuable to have a range of works published so reasonably in one volume'

Going Home (and other plays) by Alma De Groen
Carnegie Press Pty Ltd., Sydney 1977
Recommended retail price $4

We have become so used to Australian subjects being treated satirically and abusively in the theatre that Alma De Groen's recent major play, Going Home based on one of the women with extraordinary insight. It is now published by Carnegie along with the more satirical Joan Adams Show and Perfectly All Right is a fairly straightforward outline of her plays. To the director working on any one of these plays it should be interesting to compare them, and to the rest of us it is remarkably valuable to have a range of works published so reasonably in one volume.

The other two of these plays — connects Joan Adams and Perfectly All Right — work as a more restrained stylistic way that possibly looks back to De Groen's The After-Life of Arthur Cress. Perhaps for this reason, it is easy to see The Joan Adams Show as a short theme on the battered-baby syndrome, but within the framework of the television interview the playwright finds room to show the bitterness of sexual and domestic life which leads to the death of Joan's baby. The interview emphasizes to the audience, in the social relationships towards a particularly desperate figure like Joan, but the flashes back and forward allow the husband's character to be presented with some sympathy. In the much shorter Perfectly All Right, a young boarder is confronted by a delicate landlady who compassionately moves things about his room. The sexual motivation is an obvious one, the deepest, but both are kept in balance by De Groen's comic treatment of this situation.

Both the short plays almost look like preparatory works for Going Home, which dramatizes a group of Australian contemporary urban living and partly living in Canada. If one sees the wife Zoe, then De Groen's earlier women have developed considerably. Like Joan, Zoe is a compulsive shopper, but guilty to the point where she smothered purchased potted plants by locking them away from her husband's scrutiny. There is undoubtedly a sexual dimension in the obsession with furniture in this play too, but, as John Sumner warns in his introduction to Going Home, it is a mistake to see the play as a sociological account of wife-bashing, ugly people etc., and it is the laudably naturalistic form of this play which allows the playwright to move between comic and serious elements. Going Home works in a refreshingly non-conformist way — even the oppressive Tom has a sympathetic bit speech which brings his wife back to him, and the playwright is not afraid of intimate moments between Zee and Jan, the central pair, when the music comes down. All other things aside, Alma De Groen has written five superbly accessible characters. Whether the characters are really as any one "going home" remains for one of the dramatic aspects of this play, but, as Max Cullen says in his fairly controversial comments on this edition, it does constitute an attack on the trendy attitudes which lead artists to apocryphal themselves before they have any sense of identity. ■

Who's Who in the Theatre

'... one must realise the immense task facing the editors and applaud them for... a magnificent result'

Who's Who in the Theatre, edited by Ian Herbert, with Christine Baxter and Robert E. Finley. Pinner, London (15 pounds) and Gile Research, Devon (250)

One of the two most invaluable reference books for theatre buffs must surely be Who's Who in the Theatre, the 16th edition of which has recently been published simultaneously in England and America.

Running into 1288 pages, it has been edited by Ian Herbert, assisted by Christine Baxter and Robert E. Finley, in association with an editorial board consisting of editors Richard Attenborough, John Gielgud, Michael Redgrave and Dorothy Tutin, and producers Alexander H. Cohen, Eville Linder and Peter Saunders.

First published in 1912, apparently only two people have figured in all editions: Cissy Courtneidge and Arthur Saylor. The latest edition has been completely re-written throughout in a more modern and readable style, which also means that entries take up less space than previously.

Unlike most other kinds of Who's Who, then, for the Theatre never becomes overly obsessive, since one consistently refers to previous volumes for details of artists who have died, quit and much other information. The eighth edition (1936), for instance, contained features long since deleted: theatrical family trees, actresses who married into the peerage, Continued Performances, roll-of-honour for the 1914-18 War and theatrical wills. The 14th edition (1967) included 12 pages of photographs from producers of the past.

Dropped from the current edition is the list of names in the theatre section, and the general index to London playbills (1921-1965). This edition does, however, embrace London, New York, Stratford-upon-Avon, Chichester Festival and Ontario's Stratford Festival playbills for 1971-5, and a separate London and New York long-run list, provides details of London and New York theatres, plus openings of new ones, lists biographies from previous years now deleted, as well as obituary notes for 1971-6.

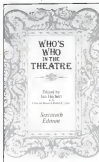

Coming to the main body of the book, the biographical section which takes up 944 pages, everyone is inevitably going to pick upon some equally obscure and others whom they consider should not be included. Nevertheless, too, may be the fact that entries are not confined to performers but also take in directors, producers, playwrights, designers and even in some cases critics and publicists.

It is not difficult to light upon omissions and factual errors, particularly in dates. And it can be very irritating to find some well-known facts not recorded, particularly where the information must be available. As a minor example Coral Browne's current husband is correctly shown as Vincent Price, but the entry for Price indicates his wife is Mary Grant.

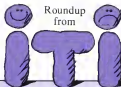

Exaggerating such criticisms, one might find the immense task facing the editors, and applaud them for what, after all is really a magnificent result. Having interviewed theatre folk for many years, I know all too well how frequently they can get their personal facts muddled, and thus frequently have to be checked and re-checked. Re-checking all the facts contained in this Who's Who is a chore I, for one, should not relish.

Most people will consider the Australian coverage totally inadequate. Perhaps here I may be allowed to add a personal note. In the previous edition, it seemed the only Australian featured currently living in the country was Ron Haddrick. I took it upon myself to point out this discrepancy to the editor and was asked to suggest likely names which could be put before the editorial board, keeping such a list extremely short. This I did, but, for some reason, not many of these people feature in this current volume.

I understood, however, that the next edition probably will contain more Australian entries. Lacking an illustration Who's Who in the Theatre, it is to be hoped future volumes may even go as far as to include details of Australian theatres and playbills.

Australian Centre, International Theatre Institute

International Theatre Institute (ITI) Australian Centre, 111 Darling Street, Paris, Postal Sydney, Box 117, North Sydney, NSW 2061. President Robert Quaresima secretary Marie Therese editor Susan Pittman

DIRECTORY OF CANADIAN PLAYS AND PLAYWRIGHTS

This very interesting directory contains synopses of more than 300 plays (including children's plays), biographies of 100 playwrights and an outline of the work of the Playwrights' Co-operative, Canada's 'largest fulltime centre for contemporary Canadian drama'.

The Playwrights' Co-operative, launched five years ago, 'publishes and distributes contemporary stage plays, provides a reading and consultation service for new and developing Canadian playwrights, and acts as an agency and service bureau'.

Scripts may be ordered from the co-op as long as they are prepared, and directors are available.

Copies of the directory are available for $10 (Canadian) each to cover postage and handling from The Playwrights Co-operative, 8 York Street, 4th floor, Toronto, M5J 1R2, Ontario, Canada.

MUSIC THEATRE TRAINING

The International Dance Section of the ITI has organised a 10-day seminar on music theatre training at the Roy Hart Theatre, Amiens, France, from 12 to 22 August.

Practical work will consist of group exercises in movement and voice-training, as well as individual help in singing, acting and dancing. Instruction will mostly be given by members of the Roy Hart Theatre, although participants may take part in exercises.

No fees will be required. However, there will be a modest charge for accommodation. People interested in this seminar should contact the ITI Australian Centre.

THEATRE DES NATIONS

The festival of the Theatre des Nations,

1977 has been cancelled. Plans to arrange this ITI Festival in connection with the Nancy or Angoulême festivals fell through because a subsidy was refused by the French Government.

The festival of the Theatre des Nations, 1976 will probably be held in Caracas, Venezuela, and the fifth world season, in 1979, in Hamburg. The 1975 festival was held in Warsaw, and the 1976 festival in Belgium.

INTERNATIONAL THEATRE TRAINING

The International Theatre Institute has arranged a contact office for developing an information exchange about international theatre training. The office is part of the Belgian ITI Centre and can be reached by writing to: Bureau de Liaison Internationale des Ecoles de Theatre, C/o Conservatoire Royal, 14 rue Foppens B—4000 Leige, Belgium.

BRITISH THEATRE INSTITUTE

The British Theatre Institute invites membership its newsletter, which goes free to members, 'takes no report racial and forthcoming developments in the theatre world in Britain'.

Membership rates are three pounds sterling for individuals from overseas and 10 pounds for corporations, who receive five copies of the B-TI Newsletter. Cheques should be made payable to British Theatre Institute and applications should be sent to: Membership Secretary, British Theatre Institute, c/o M. 55, 25 Bedford Square, London WC1B 3BE.

WIRTSCHAFTSFRONTEREN

A conference entitled 'Across Frontiers of Theatre' will be held at Canterbury, England, at the University of Kent, from 14 to 17 September 1977.

The aim of the conference is to explore popular drama and entertainment in its historical and contemporary forms. Other topics will include the interrelationship between film and theatre, and political theatre.

For further information write to: Dr Louis James, Keynes College, The University, Canterbury CT2 7NP, Kent.

THEATRE HISTORY

An annual series in Theatre History organised by the Istituto Internazionale per la Ricerca Teatrale is to be held in Venice from 8 to 14 September 1977.

The theme will be 'Aspects of Realism and Naturalism in the Theatre of the Second Half of the 19th Century in Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, the Netherlands, Poland and Hungary'.

For further information write to: The Director, Istituto Internazionale per la Ricerca Teatrale, Casa di Goldoni, 5 Toma, 2794, 30123, Venezia, Italy.

TECHNICAL EXHIBITIONS

The second CISCOS — International Fair of Cinema, Theatre, Concerts Hall, Production Equipment and Related Materials — will be held in Paris at the Parc des Expositions, Porte de Versailles, from 2 to 7 October 1977. For information providing free access to CISCOS, professionals wishing to attend should write to: Marie-Christine Asson, International Association CISCOS, Commissariat General J, Rue Garance, 92200, Neuilly, France.

WIRTSCHAFTSFRONTEREN DE ROEPEN TOEGANG

The general manager of Wiener Wirt, Mr Donald McDonald, wishes to visit Japan in Australia 'on voyage' for a tour from 16 November until 26 December 1977 costing $2710, which includes air fares, hotel accommodation, surface transport and tickets to 16 musical performances in Rome, Florence, Vienna, Salzburg, Munich, Zurich, Paris and London, as well as sightseeing in Italy, Austria, Germany, Switzerland, France and England.

Wiener Wirt's administrative officer of international tours, Suzanne Gibson, will accompany the group and will be glad to supply additional information at 69-71 Clarence Street, Sydney, NSW, 2000.

First in the National Poll
All Australia Agrees

NIMROD

Theatre

Advance Australian Made!
Buy the EUREKA Season Tickets

GOING HOME

Alma de Groen

JACK

Jim McNeil

THE CLUB

David Williamson

3 Oz plays for $12 (students $9)

Eureka Season Tickets save you up to $12 on a double ticket for the three Australian plays upstern from late July to November — and give you a concession on Nimrod Downstairs productions: Max Gillies in 'A Sketch of the Imagination' from the Pantom Factory and David Hare's 'Foster'

Telephone 695003

for a brochure or call at Nimrod, 500 Elisabeth Street Sunny Hills

Join the Parade to the Nimrod!

BUMPER SEASON IN NEW YORK

A.B. Weiner, formerly Professor of Theatre at the University of New South Wales, is Professor of Theatre at the State University of New York at Albany. He is the author of three books and many articles, mostly on Shakespeare. He has also published several studies on the 19th-century Sydney stage. George Geaghegan, one of Australia's first playwrights, thinks that from the grave he has been rescued by Weiner's reputation. In his spare time Dr Weiner directs plays, including recently a production of A Summer's Dream in Melbourne.

It happens every year around this time, and like the pains of childbirth, we forget that it was exactly like this last year. I am speaking of the annual season in New York. It should have started on 21 March, but according to the polar blizzards that rained up Seventh Avenue it is still winter. We have forgotten that we should have remembered that spring never comes as far north as New York, so go directly from winter into summer. We are waiting, then, for summer to arrive and signal the winding down of yet another New York theatrical season.

It is probably presumptuous for me to try to sum up everything that has opened or closed during the 1976-7 season, and conclude that this was a good or bad or average season, but from the financial point-of-view it was a bumper year. In the midst of what has been called a serious inflation/depression, one sees more Cadillac, Lincoln, and Mercedes on the streets than ever before, and in spite of the skyrocketing costs of Broadway tickets, empty seats are rare. How come? American business ingenuity has once more triumphed in discovering a way to charge more for tickets than the market will bear, while at the same time not discouraging the market. At present the price of a ticket for an ordinary, non-musical Broadway show is a bottom figure of $15.10 to a top of $1517.50. That is simply too expensive for many people, so the producers found a way to have their cake and eat it, to keep the theatres full without lowering their prices. There is a booth at Forty-ninth Street and Broadway where "twelfers" are sold. "Twelfers" of course, stands for "twelfthousandsoff", an old American custom. An hour or so before curtain time people begin to line up at the twelfth booth where they can buy for half-price a ticket for almost any Broadway show that is not sold out. So, if you just want to go to the theatre regardless of what you see, and if you don't mind queuing up, you can spend as little as $6 for a ticket. While this practice has enormously revitalised the New York stage, discounts will open and close. One of the most notable of recent changes was a down-and-quartered Carson and Carpova with Rex Harrison and Elizabeth Ashley. It closed after 12 performances and sustained a loss of $15000000. Now Mr Harrison can go back to what he used enjoy and does best, making television commercials for American cars.

I am afraid that the most exciting aspect of Broadway at the moment is the financial rather than the artistic. There is a kind of counter-revolution on Broadway that is, I believe, unique in the world. It really must be seen to be believed. And I am not arguing that art must be kept pure from the money-disgrace. I think that the only artists who criticize money are failed artists. Money is as necessary to the theatre as oxygen, but this is not what I am talking about. The Theatre district is like a bazaar, a department store, a stock market, thousands of people buying, hundreds of people selling. One doesn't just buy a ticket, one makes a deal. Ticket agents — independent businessmen — invest in tickets the way stock brokers invest in shares of stocks. The ticket agents, who make their profit by racking on a stiff surcharge to all tickets they sell, have first choice on tickets when they are first put on sale. If they believe that a certain show is a "winner" they will buy heavily. New York businessmen, who are visited by buyers from all over the world, keep a supply of hard-to-get theatre tickets to sweeten deals, to help them get orders. Supplying tickets at a fancy price is an out-of-town buyer's rule.

Only buyers refer to plays as plays or actors as actors. The industry refers to shows as "properties". Thus, an actor who has had wide exposure on television on the variety, and who is expected therefore to attract a large audience, is a "hot property". Broadway producers, who must invest huge amounts to get a show on the stage, try to reduce their risks as much as possible by having as many "hot properties" as they can afford. Shows must, therefore, be packaged much like a tube of toothpaste or a box of detergent.

Here is a case. Back in 1971, Marvin Chazane, a mildly successful Broadway lyricist, decided that a musical based on the comic strip "Little Orphan Annie" had great promise. At that point he had not put pen to paper, nor did he have an artistic inspiration. He had only an idea to make money. It was not a failed idea, however, for there had already been successful musicals based on Lil Abner and Charlie Brown. Chazane had to package his idea.

'Shows must be packaged like a tube of toothpaste

He got a certain Thomas Meehan to write the book, and Charles Shereau, a mildly successful Broadway composer, to compose the score. Charon himself would write the lyrics. Five years later, there was a surge of some sorts. A really hot property was needed. They went out to sign one of the hottest properties around, Mike Nichols, in producer and director. Six years later, in 1977, the package was ready to be tied up with a pretty but absolutely necessary ribbon market type. Thus, for the past two months stories and photographs about Annie are prominent every time you open up the New York Times as well as many national magazines. The object of all this publicity? Annie must be made a hit even before it opens. Indeed, if by opening night — which is almost upon us — Annie is not sold out for the next three months, the show is gone. In fact, a failure will probably close in a week or two. As any good manufacturer tries to package his product to make it appealing in the market place — quite aside from what is actually inside the package — Annie has been thoughtfully packaged. If it succeeds, it will make a fortune, not just in ticket sales, but from the cast albums, T-shirts, dolls, future royalties, perhaps film rights, etc., etc., of numerous. If it fails, perhaps $750,000 of other people's money will have been lost, but that is an economic waste of it.

I find this a good deal more interesting than most of the plays that are currently running. My greatest disappointment was a new play by Ronald Harpelle, Cold Storage. It has received excellent reviews, and I was able to get a ticket only after Mr. Harpelle graciously agreed to meet me at the box office and give me one of his business cards. Two of Harpelle's earlier plays — Murder, Moon and Night and Journey of the Fifth Horse — I consider to be among the best American plays for at least the last decade. Indeed, I had the pleasure of directing the former of these plays and it was an extremely satisfying experience.

But Cold Storage simply does not make it. It presents us with two cancer patients in a New York hospital, one a slowly advancing prostatesurgeon of advanced years, the other a sophisticated Jewish art dealer. For two acts these men discuss life's problems, cancer, and Jerusalem. No specific problem is posed and no solutions are offered. The writing by Martin Berman and Michael Lipton is fine, as is the direction by Joel Zwick, and the set by Kurt Lindell. Indeed, everything about the production is excellent except the play. In this case the parts are greater than the whole, the characters are strong and well-defined, and the dialogue is witty and even evasive. But Cold Storage is far closer to a continuing series on television than it is to a stage play. On writing a series of television drama, the single unalterable rule is that the protagonist must be exactly the same at the end of the show as he was at the beginning, for next week he must begin all over again. In stage drama the opposite is true. The protagonist must have a change of fortune, or metaphors. Without the metaphors the action cannot be complete, for all actions that are complete must, by necessity, end in either success or failure. Cold Storage fails because it does not have a complete action, as one walks up the aisle after the final quarter, the prospect of forgetting what one has just seen is already well advanced.

I could make almost identical remarks about Simon Gray's Chatterbox Engaged in London production that is all for reasons I cannot fashion, running after one year. Tom Courtenay's acting is all that one could wish, and Harold Pinter's direction was superb. I have always thought that Pinter was a far better director than a playwright, and this production strengthened that belief. In that Chatterbox Engaged has no metaphors — the protagonist is exactly the same at the beginning as he is at the end — it would be boring to recall the events that continue to bring about this violence.

The best show in New York at the moment is Sly Fox by Larry Gelbart, which is based on Ben Jonson's Volpone. It is masterfully directed by Arthur Penn, and wonderfully acted by George C. Scott, Jack Gilford, John Holliman, Bob Dole, and Homer Elinor. Larry Gelbart's greatest successes have been adaptations rather than originally conceived works. He is best known for his television series, *M*A*S*H*, which was based on the film, and A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, which was based on notes from Plautus. Mr. Gelbart is a very funny man, or, to put that more precisely, he seems to have little difficulty in making his audience laugh. I think there is a nice distinction here. To state this is a paradox, Sly Fox gets more laughs a minute than Volpone, but Volpone is a better comedy. If we could rate comedies on a laugh-meter, then Jack Benny and Bob Hope would be funnier than Shakespeare and Melrose.

The art of writing comedy would seem to comprise two distinct talents: the ability to create funny jokes, and the ability to create funny characters. The latter is clearly the more difficult and elusive talent. Falstaff and Melindas are unforgettable, jokes are atrociously forgettable. Mr. Gelbart's talent seems to be that of taking an already-created character and putting in his mouth an embarrassing sentence of jokes, one after the other. He is really quite clearing a long thin line.

I think, however, that Mr. Gelbart's triumph was less what he did in Volpone than what he didn't do. Specifically, he left Jonson's characters intact. He changed the locale and time to San Francisco in the late 19th century, and he changed the characters' names. Volpone becomes Frederick J. Sly, Mosca becomes Simon Able, Voltore becomes Lawyer Cramer, Corbaccio becomes Jeffery Crouch, and Corvino becomes Albert Trunkle. (These are really unfortunate choices compared to Jonson's wicked managers.) Further, Gelbart has written out all of the sub-plot material, and thus has changed Jonson's highly complex plot into a very simple one.

The action of Sly Fox concerns itself only with the clapping of Cramer, Crouch, and Trunkle. Gone are the characters of Sir Politic Would-be, Lady Would-be, and Peignieur, and all of the plotty stuff they are involved in.

But Gelbart has done more than merely simplify Volpone. He has sentimentalized it. While Jonson sharply disapproved vice and folly, giving them no quarter while he created a world of animals representing a whole gallery of mankind's most vicious characteristics, Gelbart seems to think that such behavior is good, innocent fun. At the end of Jonson's play, Volpone has his wealth confiscated and he is imprisoned in the hospital of the incurable. Mosca is whipped and then imprisoned in the gallies. In Sly Fox, Sly and Simon, having lost their wealth on ahead of time, go off triumphant at play's end, to set up business elsewhere and, presumably, deplore their knavery on other unsuspecting souls. Thus, it seems to me, is the very antithesis of Jonson's purpose in writing Volpone, and thus, as a play to be read and pondered, it is greatly lacking, as a stageworthy vehicle, however, it is superb.

The production is brilliant. I had never seen George C. Scott on the stage before. I had seen him only in film, and I had concluded that he was a great actor, unquestionably America's best. Well, I must repeat that Scott is not a great actor. He lacks the transcendental imagination that separates great actors from the merely good. His own personality is too strong for him to submerge it in the disguise which he actually becomes someone else. Yet he is a good actor, perhaps even a very good actor, and sometimes that can be more satisfying to an audience than to witness a great performance. While in his films he embodies the rest of his fellow actors like a Caliban, in Sly Fox he was just one of an excellent cast. I concluded that his overpowering of the fellow cast members in the film is more of a comment on the type of actor who works in Hollywood than it is of Scott. In the Land of the Blind, after all, the one-eyed man is king. In this production he was playing with a group of unusual New York professionalists, and they were not about to be overwhelmed. There was only one person in the cast who was obviously out of her depth: Trish Van Deuren. If she were unaware that she is the wife of George Scott, one might very well have his money trying to figure out why she was not. It has been announced recently that Scott will leave the company, but the production is so good that I do not think that that will make the slightest difference. ■

Peter Kenna's

A HARD GOD

Named: Gloria Gwynn as Aggie, Frank Gillies as Paddy, Graham Moore as Dan.

"... in some ways a play . . . whose fine qualities have not yet been adequately acknowledged"

Since The Legend Of King O'Malley, which, they say, set the great ball rolling, goodness knows how many new Australian plays have been given an airing in our theatres. Looking back over the so-called "renascence", one at beginning is fed confidence about which handful of plays from the whole writer is going to stand the test of time, and will still be of interest to theatrical managements, not to say scholars, come the year 2000. One such play, I suggest, is Peter Kenna's A Hard God — in some ways a play, although certainly not neglected, whose fine qualities have not yet been adequately acknowledged.

A Hard God stands out from the rest of new Australian plays, so far as one can generalize about the rest, in a number of ways, and especially by avoidance of some of its clichés and excesses. It endows Ockerman, the intellectual middle-class messiah, historical pastiche, satirical cozen, brave and blurted four-letter language, sexual daring. Rather than any of those obsessions, it has what good and great plays have always had: a grappling with the complex problems of living, and genuine feeling for human beings beset with life's dilemmas. Is less of cleverness it has honesty.

A keener of all worthwhile literature is the arousal of the sympathetic emotions, and A Hard God achieves this arousal. Peter Kenna has that quality which is not easy to find in so many of his colleagues, and which Katharine Hepburn has as rightly deserved compassion. He has obviously a great affection for the people in his play, and a deeply felt sympathy for their struggles in the coils of both religious faith and family relationships. The sensitivity of the writing causes these feelings to be shared with the audience and the reader.

We sympathise with the characters' involvement with the play's central issue of which is at the centre of his or her being, and on which depend, and which they explain, all of his or her behaviour and attitudes. Martin's spiritual crisis, for example, wants to be "no name". Aggie's "to put her family first". This emotional clarity and consistency of conception gives the observations a strong empathetic thrust. They are recognisably human.

The characters are, moreover, intrinsically Australian, exemplifying the life and living which are confined to rejection the problems of middle and old age (physical slowing down, dimming eyesight, loss of the marriage partner, disadornment from one's home, an unstable marriage relationship which has gone to all too long, strained brother and sister relationships) the "generation gap" problem, the problem of sex in adolescence and in particular that of homosexual attachment. There is, furthermore, the great universal theme of the burden of Time, which is so beautifully coherent in the play.

In summary, the characters in A Hard God are all victims of forces beyond their control, but has always been the wall of tragedy in literature.

One should also comment on the structure of the play. It attempts a degree of correspondence within the naturalistic mode — parallel actions. It was perhaps this aspect of the play which attracted harshest critical comments at the time of its first production at the Mairland Theatre, Sydney, in September 1973. H. G. Sappin, for one, asserted that there was a serious flaw in "a lack of linkage" between the family scenes and the scenes between the two boys, Jon and Jack. That was too severe. Linkage was there if one attended closely, but I think one has to concede that there was a need for a greater clarity in this regard, a somewhat stronger linkage. When the play was published by Currency Press, Peter Kemp has added the first five speeches of the text, and shown Jon in the domestic circle. This economic measure, I believe, resolves the problem already.

Some critics made remarks such as "the play is a little windy", and saw some of its long speeches as lack of event action as a blemish. These responses failed to recognise the loss of the play and its structural theme in regard to time. As Susan Dermod said in Showbusiness: "The family is focused in that moment when the threats are most reprehensible then pressing, and there is the possibility for working over them and even understanding them, in quietness." Part of the Cassidy pathos is in the fact that time is very much pressing to a standard for the older members of the family (who indulge in the long bouts of talk), yet for young Jon oscillates between a rapid look-asking speed on the one hand, and a slow considering pace on the other. Thus Katharine Hepburn in the Australian perceived that, among other things, the form of the parallel actions of the play, by juxtaposing these speeches, represents "an experiment with time."

There are many other observations which could be made. Suffice it to repeat that A Hard God is a destined fine play, and that one day it will be given a critical analysis at a depth of approach in which is proportionate to its merits, and which has not only been possible here.

W. A. National Theatre: Joan Sweeney as Aggie, Gavin Scott as Don.

the difficulty of mounting faith in a loving God when he imposes a harsh life-experience and when the Church exacts severe duties and disciplines. We sympathise with Don's huge solace and the unfairness of the storm played upon him by unfeeling brothers. We understand Aggie's love, her forthrightness, her occasional toughness. We feel for Martin's struggles with his pulpit (because their rescue is so clearly and tolerantly explained in the play) and his efforts to expose himself as wrong. We appreciate young Jack's efforts to reconcile his sexual awakening and disposition with the "hard God" of his upbringing.

Our sympathies are sustained even in the comic scenes. Indeed, a real achievement of the writing is in its lively and loving blend of humour and pathos. Don's reading of the paper on top of the table in order to be near the light is comically comic, but is also moving because his falling asleep, in both its symptom of decline and another unfair burden for an already overtaxed man. Paddy and Monica are outrageously comic in many ways, but a sadistic, look, provides these peculiar relationships.

A Hard God is a good play because it is so vital. Its people live because they are realised so richly and unambiguously, but also conceived so simply and clearly. The playwright, like all good authors, has given each of them a discernible motivating drive workplaces which that which so many of us — and our values — spring. A Hard God is a good play because it justifies its character attitudes and behaviour by showing them determined by strong, irremediable social, economic and religious forces. There are few pieces of Australian writing, let alone plays, which demonstrate so vividly the Irish-Catholic ethos in Australia, and which expose so potently the nature of the influence of the Depression on Australian families. (How accurate, for instance, is the dispossession and migration of the Cassidy family, as to be one more small example, the telling reference to the son of Captain Selworthy.)

In a very real sense, A Hard God is a sociological document. It is a history play, or at least a play in which a period — its language, habits, values, mores — is so integral to the drama as the plot and character development. I am certain that this slogan in the play alone will guarantee the play's survival. How astutely woven into the fabric of the play, for example, is such language and social allusions as "He's got the measles on him", "Brixton", "Paddy was coming in at the bookmaking business", "a bulging chaff-bag", "Have you ever gone all the way with a girl?", "I'm going up to Woy Woy", "bloomin'", "Civil Angles", and "Saturday night dinner."

The play also touches on other themes of more than superficial interest, matters of Research material for students and teachers, with photos, excerpts from reviews, study questions, essay questions and comments by Peter Kemp and Don Read, is available from Currency Press, 87 River Road, Woburn, NSW 2025.

'THE CRYSTAL PALACE' STARTS A NEW LIFE

'It has to be significant when a movie house changes to live theatre'

Some sort of theatrical history must have been made in April when Nanette Hayes and Gaiarre Blundell opened the Regal Theatre in Perth with Bernard Slade's Some Time Next Year. With theatres closing in all directions, it has to be significant when a movie house changes to live theatre. And that's what happened at the Regal.

The Regal was built as a movie house in 1937 (it opened in April 1938) by a man called Cande, who was grandfather to playwright-poetess Dorothy Hewett. In fact, Dorothy's father, Tom Hewett, was manager, and it's the Regal that figures so prominently as the Crystal Palace in Dorothy Hewett's play Don Bore and Acres for Dolly.

I sat close to Dorothy at the Hollywood-type gala opening on 15 April this year. It had all the trimmings: marching girls parading in a closed-off street under the shimmering spotlights, a band playing, policemen in all directions, radio and TV personalities driven up in large cars hired by the organisers, and half the population of Subiaco crowding round to see the free show and watch the celebrities walk up the red carpet. In fact, you couldn't see the carpet because the celebrities were stuck in a bottleneck, trying to sway their busy invitations for mass adulation. But it was all good fun, and — to coin a phrase — a good time was had by all, particularly in the all-night supper bar.

I asked Dorothy how a film to be back just a little nostalgic, she admitted. She was with her mother, Dr Douglas, of Perth, and for both of them it brought back a lot of their adolescence that had centred round the place. And surely the Dolly of the play must have a great deal of Dorothy herself.

The Regal's cinema history has been interesting. It is owned by 66-year-old Pat Baker, a Western Australian counterpart of the leading figure in Jean Lang's recently released film The Picture Show Man. Baker began in films at the age of eight, turning the hand-cranked projector at Subiaco, a goldfields town, now in the ghost category but then a prosperous place with a population of well over a thousand. His father was a travelling runner. Pat got fourpence a night — "three nights for a boy," he explains — and eventually worked his way up until he owned his own travelling show. "Baker's Photo-Play De Luxe," it was called. "I never remained cinema," Pat says. "After all, a picture show is just a filmed play!" He worked 16 hours a day for seven days a week, and visited just about every outback town in the State.

He ended up a rich man, a notable property owner in Subiaco, where the Regal stands. And eventually he gave up his travelling show and started opening drive-in movies. He now has an or seven of them scattered around the State. He also had an expensive movie house just across the road. He bought the Regal from his friend Tom Hewett in 1946.

He's very proud of the Regal. "It was the finest theatre in the Southern Hemisphere when it was built," he claims. "And it was the first with air-conditioning." This fact isn't quite accurate by modern standards, but it did have a splendid air-cooling system, which could blow in cold and carbon hot air in the summer, and heat it during the winter. It wouldn't be difficult to convert this to modern air-conditioning.

Although he will go on to show or screen on Sundays, he's also very pleased that the theatre has gone over to stage plays. "I've got all the money I need," he says. "So I'm not going to charge high rates." In fact, the seat he's taking is reserved by Perth standards, where the rental of Her Majesty's makes local productions there almost impossible. And he's eager going to let the place be bulldozed or turned into a warehouse.

The success of the Hayes-Blundell show, followed by an equally successful Gordon Chait in The Education of Benjamin Franklin, makes it likely that a well-timed event to bring a movie house, John Thornton, Western Australian representative of Parashute Productions, and a director of interest, said that he has several other shows lined up. There is, of course, too, of Don Bore and Acres being produced again in the theatre that played such a part in it.

It all has taken place, live theatre in Perth might have a new lease of life. The possible dampening of the stage would raise that the WA Ballet — starved of a proper home at the moment — could hope to put on shows at a profit, which is almost impossible in places like "The May" and the Playhouse. The West Entertainment Centre is quite impossible for anything but Edgely extravaganzas.

One can only hope that Parashute-Innovator keep on being as successful at the Regal as they have been up to now. Because the foyer will no longer be "teeming with audience" and there won't be midweek on the boxes any more.

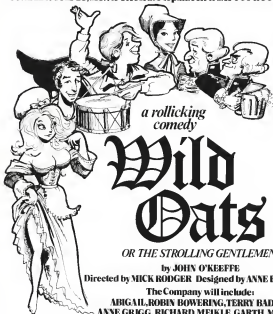

Picture-show-man Pat Baker with Blundell Hayes and John Thornton of Parashute

THE OLD TOTE THEATRE COMPANY 🍷

at the YORK THEATRE
SEYMOUR CENTRE 🍷

JUNE 22 to JULY 26, MON to THUR at 8-15 p.m. FRI & SAT 5-30 & 8-30 p.m.

a rollicking comedy

Wild Oats

OR THE STROLLING GENTLEMEN

by JOHN O'KEEFPE

Directed by MICK BODGER Designed by ANNE FRASER

The Company will include:

ABIGAIL, ROBIN BOWERING, TERRY BADER
ANNE GRIGG, RICHARD MEIKLE, GARTH MEADE.

ALL BOOKINGS NOW OPEN - BOOK AT

Seymour Centre (Cor. Cleveland St. & City Rd. Chippendale) 692 0666, Parade Theatre (663 6122) and agencies.
ALL SEATS $7.20 (evs), $8.30 (matr). Pensioner & Childrens concessions available.
FOR EXCELLENT PARTY CONCESSIONS PHONE JENNIS MCKENZIE 692 0666 or The Party Organizer 663 6122.

PARK, DINE & SEE THE SHOW

One stop entertainment at the Seymour Centre. Enquiries 692 0666

The Picture Show Man The FJ Holden

Contrasts in 'style and content — and possibly in aim . . .'

It must be taken as a plea for our miserable film industry that it can in the same week present two films as different in style and content — and possibly in aim — as The Picture Show Man and The FJ Holden.

I don't say that one is "better" than the other, though I tend to think that, with everything that's the matter with it, The FJ Holden will last longer in our consciousness.

To take The Picture Show Man first, it is set strictly in good old Mordialloc, where the seaside looks as city-dwellers think it should look, or as they remember it looking when they were holiday kids fishing in a creek. Assuming they ever fished in a creek. Once on the track towards Mordialloc, the accompanying images proliferate embarrassingly. Anyway, is this country a dogged John Mielton, wearing a worried frown, mustache and a head cast with a velvet collar which might have been more suitable for Broadway, shows films as mechanics' instructions and church bells while a companion bangs out lyrics in the borrowed piano. His territory is invaded by someone to whom he actually taught the business, in the person of Rod Taylor, presumably hired to attract overseas audiences. The place is who will survive?

Between the beginning, which is pretty, and the end, which is jolly, there is a series of modified variety turns in which John Ewart, Judy Morris, Kenneth Williams, Gerry McEldown, Yvonne Ziga, Frank Coughlin and other performers with recognisable names take part. One rec-dent merges with the other, and through a golden haze of recalled and commercial deals, bumping androgynous and erotic sexual encounters. When John Mielton purports to make a marriage pact at the beautiful Yelena, you know he doesn't mean it and would be appalled if she accepted his advances. The character's strongest quality is bluff — mistakes to hide a tired lip, bluster to disguise fear, a velvet collar to distract attention from frayed cuffs. John Mielton does the character very well, but the character itself is a caricature.

So what is the point of The Picture Show Man? Presumably films are made for commercial gain, or to say something the greater truths should be said, or to change people's habits and opinions, or to preach a political sermon, or to relieve personal rebellion, or the lot is a long list.

Miss Jean Long produced The Picture Show Man from the recollections of Lyle Paine, whose father was one in the same period and landscapes. I should say that she hoped the film would succeed commercially without having to ponder to the centre of the lowest opinion disseminator, whenever he pays his $2.50 for a seat. But while money can be pulled up and put aside at the point of a bank, as a film needs support, such as a real understanding of inevitable changes in the human condition and their tragic occurrence in time and place. If there was a glimpse of this in the film, it came fleetingly in Judy Morris's performance as one of those deluded, acutely but overwrought ladies who pursue culture in country seats. The film has been described as "charming in its simplicity." I find it simple, but not charming. And, quite often, boring.

There is not much of The FJ Holden that is boring, but a good deal of it is repetitive, scenes go on too long and are so badly delineated that characters, vehicles and interiors are all too easily confused. Not that this could be said about the FJ Holden itself once its faded and splattered paintwork has been covered in shiny-yellow Duco. The car is, as Michael Thornton's no doubt intended, the one thing you won't forget.

Thornton, sometimes known as film-sometimes film critic, maker of Screeners films, as producer, director and writer of The FJ Holden, and this may be the reason why it doesn't really work very well. His possibly amusing but becoming manner, the kind of film man who gets in a name above the product, and the performers. In this case, he has a fair way to go, although I don't believe for a moment that he will act far there. If Thornton has faith in his genre, so have a lot of other people.

The FJ Holden is set in Sydney's western suburbs, of which physiognomy takes in other big Australian cities and its miniature form right across the Commonwealth, and is about a couple of selfish young men and a shop assistant they pick up one night and copulate with in the FJ Holden.

She attaches herself to the best bet of the two, as is the way of girls in suburbs other than women, and in as time they are "going together", showing one another a mixture of fondness and anticipation and having it off as only on the back seat of the car (rip down, squawk, grunt, zip up) but in her bedroom while her father is in the lobby. The first roll, as the Victorian used to say, comes when he lets his mate watch. There is then a punch-up at a Saturday night party, rap, driving charges and hideout.

Thornton as writer — his wobbly role — dodges the issues of the relationship between parents-and-police and the control levers, if that's the term for them. Here the wrong is shameful, fairly it rewarded one of parts of the script in the television series Crimes Women where the wrong was presented to the audience as shapeless honesty — a luxury confidence trick.

Thornton gets good performances from his non-actors, Paul Cameron and Ben Dickinson, and some of the rest of the cast is equally good.

It is hard to say where the audience for this film will come from, or if there will be any after the first curious wave.

Vespers: the great Monteverdi enigma

'Fortunately, we now have more than one recording of this astounding music which can give us a very fair idea of what an ideal performance of it might sound like'

Of all Monteverdi's works the Vespers of 1610 is the most mysterious. It is not certain whether it represents music conceived as a single work or merely as an anthology of Monteverdi's songs and capacity for church music. If the music was intended to constitute a single work, why are there two Magnificats? And why are all the pieces linked, as in a kind of appendix, to the unique Mass in traditional style which stands at the beginning of the published music? Dates and places of pre-Venetian performances of the music have never been established, although it seems fairly certain that all or part of the music was performed at Marino as well as at Venice III, as seems likely. Monteverdi put the collection together in order to improve his chances of getting a more important job in Rome or Venice; his plan was successful in the long run. The Vespers would have commended him to the patrons of St Mark's, Venice, as the master musician of his age.

When we have said that, however, we have to admit that the music itself is occasionally enigmatic to the point of opacity. Confused notes such as the Dies Domini and the vocal entries are so overbearing to their demand for the highest skills of vocal agility and ornamentation as to transcend any passage in the surviving Monteverdi operas in this regard. The use of canto fermo in many of the extended pieces seems curiously old-fashioned in music which is obviously intended to demonstrate Monteverdi's complete mastery of the aesthetic and technique of the early baroque. The complexity of notes and proportions, the fluidness and witfulness of some of the part writing are unusual for a composer whose work is always always calculated at exactly the level of complexity needed for a particular performance. Some of the music seems so secure as though it would need a far denser acoustic than would likely be available in any of the churches used by the composer for this music.

The published layout of the Vespers has long misled performers and would-be performers in their approaches to it. Because it seemed like a major ecclesiastical occasion, something to be put alongside the Bach Passions or the Mass rolewals, the early arrangements and realisations of it before and after World War II made it sound far too thick and grandiose. The traditional habit of viewing it as a work for choral societies and to this day such bodies tend to assume that a choral group can master the necessary additional notes to perform the work without falsifying its nature. The truth is usually the reverse: The experts to perform the Vespers should begin with solo singers and skilled instrumentalists. Choral resources ought to be the last and least important element to be considered. Much of the Vespers, including many sections of the psalm settings, consists of writing for concertall solo voices. The choral parts in the proceedings are relatively small and it is certainly not enough by itself to ensure the realisation of the work as a satisfactory reunion.

It was a failure to realise this that made the 1973 Adelaide Festival performance of excerpts from the Vespers so unsatisfactory. The psalm settings had obviously been thought of as the first instance in choral settings and the search for enough skilled soloists, vocally and instrumentally, had never come within hearing distance of success. I think that the Vespers is due to be performed at an elite-vocary choral festival this year. I cannot think of any work less suitable for a large body of singers to attempt as such a gathering.

We must at least give thanks to those persons such as Walter Goehr who established a technique of performing the Vespers, even if they also misperceived them. The work is still extremely difficult to prepare for the concert hall or the festival church performance. Fortunately, we now have more than one recording of this astounding music which can give us a very fair idea of what an ideal performance of it might sound like.

The first set of the kind came out on Telefunken (SANT 991-03, 2 discs) and offered some excellent instrumental performances on the original instruments (as faithful copies of them) specified in the score. It also offered incomparable agility from the tenor, Nigel Rogers, as one of the soloists and the last four verses of the Venite Regis Choir of suitable members of the work, notably in the subtle restraint of the Soprano signs Soprano Mass, which soon with such local beauty shows the complicated variations for instruments. The Monteverdi Choir of Hamburg left something to be desired in intonation, and the clarity of the recording was below the level of many of Telefunken's later recordings of Monteverdi and his contemporaries.

A more recent Decca recording of the Vespers, under the direction of John Elgar Gardiner in London, uses modern instruments for the instrumentally important parts and, therefore, achieves a much less authentic realisation of the sound world of the work. On the other hand, Gardiner's forces as a whole handle the music with far more assurance and style, and at that aspect his recording is preferable to the Telefunken version.

Another version, involving a vocal and instrumental ensemble in Lusanne under the direction of the emperor of Monteverdi's condition, Michel Corbucci, has become available again in a World Record Club release (R 01933, three discs). This is unusual in offering not only the first and longest Magnificat, but both Magnificats, a quite satisfactory arrangement for records, as the latter retains the choice of playing either in either of these parts. The decision to include both Magnificats probably the recording on to three discs, but the low-price release of the discs balances to a large extent the disadvantage of having to buy an extra record. Corbucci uses some traditional instruments including the wooden cornets of the period, but his instruments of brass are far less rich or loudly located than those of the Telefunken set. His tenors, Eric Tapp and Hector Cazado, certainly possess character and poignancy, but their more elaborate vocalisations do have a resemblance to the blurring of sleep. The Corbucci version would be very acceptable as a concert performance on disc: it lacks the refinement of instrumental work and the quality of solo singing that we expect from discs of such music. But it does offer the extra Magnificat.

Up to now, the choice has been between major but limited authenticity from the Gardiner version and substantially copied with a certain degree of direction from the performance directed by Rogers on Telefunken. A newer version directed by Philip Ledger for EMI (CHW 5LS 0064, 2 discs) offers a happy realisation of the difficult choice. Ledger's recording, based on an edition prepared by him and Denis Arnold, is even more brilliant in its use of an acoustically appropriate instrument than the Telefunken version (compare, for example, the much greater stylisation and accuracy of intonation of the vowels, even when the trope is considerably fainter, and a thoroughly vital control of rhythm, some very fine solos and genuine flair in realising the contrasts of proportion and metre in the score. Anthony Rolfe Johnson and Robert Tear are not as truly based in the difficult lower notes as Nigel Rogers is for Tullius, but they make a better match for each other than Rogers and his second tenor Tear is inclined to grow a little in his final passages, and there is one section of the Andantes where he and Rolfe Johnson sound like a pair of dogs worrying a bone. On their competence, however, there is no doubt, and they have some fine associates in Billy Arnold and Norman Burrows (in the two solo soprano parts), Charles Brett (alto), Martin Hill (third tenor) and Peter Knapp and John Noble (basses). The speed of the instrumental playing in the opening Overt is adequate in interesting when the slower hours in raise the difficulty of playing the concert parts (taken from the playing room at Melbourne's Opera, but Michael Lund and Iain Orr) Wilson never filter. The late and much-lamented David Maxwell leads the Early Music Consort of London with some of the additional instrumentalists, and the choral lines are taken with the greatest accuracy and with no sense to characterisation, even by the choir of King's College, Cambridge.

The basis for the overall success of this concert, however, is the performing ideas of itself and the conducting of Lodge. On the evidence of this performance Lodge's rights as King's may prove to be even more distinguished than that of his predecessors, Boris God and David Wilkie. Although the revocation period of the season of some of the final chords stands as that the recording was made, presumably, in King's College Chapel, the microphone techniques employed ensure that we hear the intricate detail of vocal and instrumental parts well enough. No mending of a work as full of textual difficulties as the Figures is even likely to be wholly successful. This one concert is close to success as I can imagine happening at the moment.

Ray Stanley's

WHISPERS & FACTS

It was the usual story when Tormentor's Tormentor opened in Melbourne (it is a full-on full Producers Theatre — last of publishers by the Australian Distribution Theatre Trust, which was presenting the show. Several personal box-office successes have been turned through the trust's inefficient publicity machine. Pity MWA didn't take up the show. The Pleasure of the Company, with Douglas Fairbanks Jr, Stanley Holloway and David Langdon, made such a hit with the blue-rose ladies of Melbourne, it could return in a few months. . . . In the same Australia could see a commercial production of 50 For the current Broadway season based on the Jonathan Wolkstein.

Should be suggested if Julia Prynne is not in the Australian production of Sale By Society Securities.

Those "doctors" Robin Swicord and Geoffrey Deane are packing 'em in again in a play even worse than Shower in the House (if that's possible). Why can't such people tour in something worth while? They would retain their self-respect, introduce new good plays to Australia, attract new audiences who would be surprised they actually liked something they otherwise would not have seen, and then everyone at all could would be happy. Why not?

Who is a young Cyril Richard? After seeing him in stage in Sydney, David Wilson, according to Joyce Grenfell, who should know as he was in Conrad and Conrad's Spit to Move with Richard. . . . A one-man show on four which sounds interesting in Limited Taste in The Legend of Henry Lawrence.

Although they did poor box-office business, I've heard good things about Hammer Valley Theatre's touring productions of Midnight in The Last Days Show and Secret The Key-Match Show, both directed by John Tucker. Tucker is going to direct Don't Fiddle Against the Wind at Pine Street (see Quotations and Quotations), with John Cameron in the cast. The original cast album of The Innocent and All That Jazz should be out soon. . . . Understand Lynn Curran is returning in the Melbourne stage in the MTC's production of David Raskin's Arles.

Remember Barbara Angell who used to be in the Modern Australian Show centrally and in revues and musicals around Melbourne? Apparently she's taken the Arts Theatre Club in London for a summer season of teaching plays writers and acted by Australians. First up is a one-woman play by Max R. Richards with the lady herself, followed by a double bill by James Norman, Substitute and There's a Moving Here Tonight, and later Miss Angell's own The Final Announcement. Other members of the company are Penny Smith, Charles Pemberton and John Turnbull.

Recently I was sent programmes for the South Australian Theatre Company's first three 1977 productions. To me they appear the most informative and best designed of any of the substandard companies. Andrew Gould explains-hand-man to Michael Edgley, will soon check up his 40th year in the Secret Uppis. Gird to see this fine actress Julia Harris in once re-creating the boards, playing Madam Ranevsky and Elizabeth Proctor in Peter Oyden's productions of The Cherry Orchard and The Crucible for the Alexander Theatre Company.

A well-known personality in Melbourne showbiz circles is branching out as an impresario and trying to lure Bobby Bloor to Australia. Maybe Grass Kicker too. . . . Tipped by some for future stardom as actor Tom Courtenay, said to be in the mould of Peter Finch. It must be difficult, and perhaps a little embarrassing, for a theatre director whose wife is an actress. Take Colin Gregg, for instance, of the South Australian Theatre Company. Wonder how many of the other actresses around are happy about her being given the plum role of Lady Teazle. Vanya in The Cherry Orchard and, in August, the lead in Anne Get Four-Gun. But tonight she's wiggling in Adelaide. Overboard at a performance of A Chorus Line. "I'm going to see the show again, Maude. I want to see who the director chooses for his musical season!"

A FAMILIAR FACE TO ALL THOSE INTERESTED IN THE THEATRE

AND ONCE AGAIN
pitman publishing pty ltd
IS PLEASED TO ANNOUNCE THE PUBLICATION OF A COMPLETELY REVISED AND ENLARGED EDITION OF

WHO'S WHO IN THE THEATRE

UP TO DATE AT THE BEGINNING OF 1977

The new eleventh edition is available now from bookshops or direct from Pitman Publishing, 1511 Corner Street, Carlton, Victoria 3053 (with a 10% discount and postage free to all members of the theatrical profession). 042 50 8887

Melbourne gets a break

'Victorians have been vouchsafed . . . two thoroughly rewarding opera experiences'

Melbourne opera-lovers have been complaining — often quite justifiably — in recent years that the national opera company gives their city a raw deal. Certainly, the only promise of a new production vouchsafed them by the Australian Opera last year was a rather unattracting re-creation of a Glyndebourne original (Janacek's The Cunning Little Vagabond) and all five of the new AGO productions for 1977 will first be seen at the Sydney Opera House.

But I can state unequivocally, on the basis of a two-night Melbourne stand in May, that Victorians have been vouchsafed, this year, two thoroughly rewarding opera experiences that will not be available in Sydney. Both productions involved — Massenet's Marriage of Figaro and Beethoven's Fidelio — were revivals of John Copley originals, Figaro from 1971 and Fidelio from 1970, but neither was wearing as age-bodily.

Indeed, the Copley Figaro, which was widely acclaimed when it first saw the light of day and had improved on its original high standard so much that the Sydney music critics singled its revival out as the most significant music event in the city last year, was almost as good as this year's Melbourne opening as it has ever been. John Pongle (Count Almaviva) and Ronald Macgregor (Figaro) were both as magnificent form dynamism to define their interpretations of roles they made their own long ago. Ned Warner-Smith (Bartolo) and Rosina Reinisch (Marcellina) continue to give superb readings of their demanding supporting roles. Robert Gard's Basilio, as dramatically strong as ever, showed remarkable vocal improvement in the aftermath of his recent study against in Germany; he is now producing by far the most pleasing sounds I have ever heard from him, and it is a thorough pleasure to see him again in a character role he does so superbly. And Cynthia Johnson's Susanna — always a pleasure — was a pure delight in this occasion.

Only Nancy Green's Countess and Jennifer Birmingham's Chrysothene were disappointing — the former for her involvement on the acting front and her occasional vocal harshness, particularly in her first big aria, "Papa Arrive"; the latter for her occasional misapprehension of the admirably hard-to-draw line between high-spirited comic acting and the sort of incensed clamour about that reduces Chrysothene to a mere adolescent huff-buff. But for a while, if passing mention must be made of Melinda Sherman (the only new face on the cast), whose Barbarina was most pleasingly sung and presented.

Perhaps it was only to be expected that this Figaro would be vocally good — though clearly Michael Beauchamp, who achieved a far Melbourne, deserves a good deal of credit for ensuring that, most of the time, at any rate, the production retained its original freshness and brightness. The big surprise, though, came on the orchestral front when the conductor, Peter Robinson, was able to impose the Elizabethan Melbourne Orchestra to give nearly as good a performance as we have come to expect of its Sydney counterpart.

This may sound condescending, but it is emphatically not, for it is common knowledge that the EMO has been through a very difficult period in the past year or so and has simply not been able to achieve the same general level of excellence as the Elizabethan Sydney Orchestra. It would be wrong to think it is the equal even now of the ESO, but most of the time one is not unduly conscious of that fact: it is only when the strings lose their consistency or the woodwind ensemble falters for an instant, or where some expected virtuoso demand of the score is not quite coped with, that one feels marginally let down.

The opening Melbourne performance of Figaro on 12 May — which was rather tactically recovered by the audience — was a good deal more satisfying all round than the following night's Fidelio under Carlo Felice Cillario. Largely this seemed to be an orchestral problem, for the EMO had much more trouble coping with the demands of the Beethoven score. I am not quite sure about the merits of Cillario's unorthodox reading of the score — as particular by exaggerating variations in tempo between numbers, and I have never really warmed to Fidelio as an overall work of art, much though I love practically every note of the score. Perhaps the basic problem lies in the way it seems always at the verge of reducing its characters to debilitated symbols in a political tract, only in the very best of performances can one really believe in the human individuality of the characters. At any rate, the actual flaws were exaggerated by the particular performance.

The orchestral playing was a good deal less effective than it had been the night before, perhaps an inevitable loss following the prelude of the last opening of the season, but the stage performers also seemed to be suffering from a malaise once the supernatural bonfire of Cillario was unable to counteract. Even the prisoner's chorus, an initial moment of high drama that almost cannot possibly go wrong in performance, was (again, a little boring, in this occasion. Only Ronald Dowd's Florestan — an absolutely new followed by a more than convincing realisation of the rest of the role — really measured up, in the final analysis, to the full potential of the role.

Lena Koppel-Winter was disappointingly wrong Leonore/Fidelio, but was quite disturbing at times vocally, particularly in her big aria in the second scene. As Pizarro, John Shaw was inclined to gabble his spoken dialogue and his singing was as unfocused as if he had the proverbial pin in his mouth. Beryl Farina's Marcelline was is pleasant to Graham Dow's Jacopina, but the only serious dramatic point of either of these being there — the hint of a neurotic amorous attachment between her and the much-young Fitcha — was completely lost. Neil Murray-Smith, doing yeoman service after his considerable stint as Bartolo the night before, was a reassuringly unimpeachable, outstanding figure of a Rocco who acted and sang very well indeed; and Robert Allan was in his usual fine form at the late start of the opera. Don Fernando (but finally the strong points of this Fitcha did not altogether counterbalance its weak ones, and it all added up to a disturbingly unimpeachable evening of the opera when Fitcha might never be hit. Even so, it was an experience worth the hearing, and one which Sydney opera-lovers will not be able to forget this year.

behind a screen.

The main trouble with the Canberra Pasquale was that the principals, once the action got going, were not, by and large, capable of living up to the admirably stringent acting demands of the piece: but they squarled enough to enhance that setting, the result would have been a reasonably sweet success. Once again, then Pasquale proved that it is a good deal harder to bring off the building interweaves of comic opera on performance, than to convince an audience of the credibility of even the most ridiculously improbable chain of tragic events. Tragedy seems to promise its own peculiar usual standard of willing suspension of disbelief; comedy, performed at less than the comic expert level is simply prone to fall flat on its face.

Franz Booby's Morrie lacked a measure of the vivacity that makes this character at Sydney's Rockdale Town Hall presented That's My Jery and The Sorcerer with less than the usual success we have come to expect of this company. Robert Hatherley played both the title role in The Sorcerer and the Judge in That's My Jery, but was not at his best in either part on an opening night. Most of the other leading roles were taken by the G and S stalwarts of the suburban circuit — Ralph Daines, John Welsh-Lingans, Mary Blake, Patrick Donnelly. Daines' Boak did appear and was never less than adequate. But Brian Phillips's production lacked conviction, and conductor Collins' Audson was prone to rush things along relentlessly instead of allowing the lyrical and lyrical to achieve maximum impact of their own volition.

The other double bill, a joint effort of the School of Opera and Music Theatre at the New South Wales Conservatorium and the Australian Opera Studio, copied little-known works by well-known composers. Dr. Miracle, by Bart, and Win and Zorak: Three and Back, by Hindemith.

Dr. Miracle has a plot line that almost makes it seem derivative of two great Dostoevski comic operas combined. The Elder of Love and Don Pasquale, though it hardly has the musical or dramatic merit of either of them. John Gerrard, of the Australian Opera, played the tyrannical father of the piece, who also happens to be Mayor of Padua. Kathleen Moore his wife, Judith Saliba his daughter, and Eddie Walder the daughter's lover Salva, who won't but in various disguises before finally winning her hand.

Wilton and Moore also played leading roles in the Hindemith piece, which literally progressed forward to halfway point and then retroceded itself back by back to end up where it started, musically and dramatically. Jennifer Lindfield, Colin Gell, Geoffrey Crooks and Geoffrey Harris also appeared in this very brief opera.

Simply staged, well if not outstandingly sung, and presented in a slightly extended lunchtime or mid-afternoon format, as these two works were, they have a good deal of merit both as class exercises for student opera singers and as short entertainment. And this particular double bill was equally welcome for the long-overdue spirit of co-operation it demonstrated between the student branch of the national opera company and the opera branch of the New South Wales Conservatorium. Such ventures should become a staple feature of the Sydney musical scene if they did, no doubt audiences would soon come to appreciate their merit and patronise them much better than they did on the occasion.

As even more notorious ventures off the beaten track were made early in May, when the director of the Coa, Rex Hobbins, conducted two modern masterpieces — Donizetti's The Green Island by Harrison Burtwell and The Emperor's New Clothes by Viktor Ullmann — in three performances at the recording hall of the Opera House; unfortunately, this brief season coincided with my sojourn in Melbourne and I was not able to attend. ■

The last 1977 offering of Canberra Opera, on its home ground after pre-season at Orange and Wagga, was a superb production of Dostoevski's Don Pasquale that nearly founded, on the acting inadequacies of the principals.

Casts were kept to a minimum by a further example of the sort of cost-cutting arising: regional companies that has become a welcome feature of the Australian opera scene in recent years. The modular sets, mounted on casters so they could be rolled into place for each following scene in full view of the audience, were borrowed from the Western Australian Opera Company and rapidly changed by costumes designed locally by Graham MacLean that blended perfectly to add up to a visually excellent evocation of the high-hearted mood of the piece. Ken Meades's production realigned this season start right from the beginning of the overture, during which he had the principals move out the shadows of the plot captivating and desirable as the first instance as the proves herself capable of being played when it suits her later in the piece. Colin Slater's Malatesta, too, did not make quite the full measure of good natured wit and wit in the part. Keith Hempton's Pasquale was a little too writhed and wry, not only of nature but also of microphone, and Robert Donald's Elvira was a little too wooden in stage presence and vocal line to be as lovable as this version is here ought to be. But James MacLean got an excellent musical result from singers and orchestra alike, overall, the evening was an enjoyable one, despite the reservations I have detailed above.

Don Pasquale: Colin Slater and Franz Booby

Brief mention must be made now, this month, of two other recent double bills — one coupling two of the lesser known Gilbert and Sullivan pieces, the other very short works by Bart and Hindemith.

The G and S double bill, at suburban

GUIDE

ACT

CANBERRA OPERA (07 02049)

Allegro and Grand (Hampdenbury) in English (Continuing on tour of A.C.T. primary schools involving child participation)

See also Canberra Theatre

CANBERRA PLAYHOUSE (06 0480)

Marat Maratona (18-21 July)

Maratona Theatre of Australia (See 02049) and directed by Richard Bradshaw and Azzurro directed by the company and directed by Richard Bradshaw (20-29 July)

CANBERRA THEATRE (06 0211)

Australian Ballet: Les Femmes (July the 8th, Mondays to 9, Page 10) 2 July, Ballet 77 (24 July)

Berlioz: Damn Company (11-16 July)
Canberra Opera, The Merry Widow (Luhar) in English. Conductor, David Collins, producer, Nina Cooke, set designer, Paul Rathem, costumes, costume Australian Opera, With Lawrence Hume, Colin Skene, Gary Wilbrook, Dr Smith, Phil O'Brien

THEATRE THREE (0422)

Canberra Repertory Society
How Deep Is Our Garden Green? by Ben MacIntyre directed by Ross McGregor (10-16 July)
Tempo Theatre: Once Upon A Midwinter Musical directed by Joyce MacFarlane (17 July-18 August)

NSW AND THE WALES

ACTORS' COMPANY (061 2000)

The Tugboat (Bender), by William Shakespeare, adapted by Joseph Papp and Rosemary and Gabrielle Anne Reed, by Tim Sappard. Directed by Roddy Doherty designed by Chris Lanning. In both plays from the Siles, Herta (Dr Arrog, Kate Ferguson, Michael Ruffa, Scott Lambert, Les Armstrong, Alan Fawcett) (Playing in repertory to end of July)

ARTS COUNCIL OF NEW SOUTH WALES (02 9611)

The Bell in Bush Shave, from Frank Strong's Theatre Restaurant, William Street directed by George Currey, with Bert Moore, Lughina Wain, Penny Lee, John Barlow, Julie Gaskin

(Touring north coast and north west of NSW to 11 July)

The Fort and the Page Boy, from Deep Dark 1 Theatre Restaurant, 50 Leveaux directed by Corbin Condon, with Max Hagle, Jackie Hunter, Nicholas Lusk, Christopher Parr (Touring south coast, Port Phillip and western districts to 31 July)

The Solo Woodward And Puppet Workshop (Continuing primary schools tour of NSW south coast and Newcastle)

With 2 or more children, solo singer and some other, 40 continuing primary schools tour in Sydney metropolitan area)

Madame Xaver Theatre directed and performed by Michael Franklin (High schools tour of metropolitan area, north coast and south west to 1 July)

Dr David Webster Shaw, directed and performed by Frank Cullen and Jeffrey Manning (Primary schools tour of north west and north coast to 29 July)

Smoking Mirror, chamber music directed by Brian Spring (Primary schools and adult performance in central west to 1 July)

New England chamber music (the company Andrew Lott, Robert Harris, Joan Lunn) (Primary schools and adult performance south coast, 4-12 July)

AUSTRALIAN OPERA (02 0010)

Spitfire Opera House (2-5 July)

Opera Theatre: Les Contes d'Hoffmann (Offenbach) in French 1, 9 July (cont), 12-21 July (cont), 24, 30 July (cont) Conductor, William Rod, producer, Tito Capodaglio, designer, Anne Vassina, resident producer, Eliza Vassina with Marlene Richardson, Jennifer Newingham, Heather Bagg, or Margara Elkins, Herta Wilson, Raymond Myers, Graham Lewis, Gordon Walcott, Graham Dobson

The Barber of Seville (Rossini) in Italian 2 July (cont) Conductor, Richard Stange producer, Julia Cox (rehearsal) by Michael Beauchamp, designer, Roger Ballin, with Hagarita Tourangeau, Mary Maynard, John Wright, Paul Potts, Alan Light, Clifford Grant

For Service (Kahar) in English 2 July (cont), 7 July-10 July (cont) Conductor, Richard Stange or Peter Robinson, producer, John Gough, designer, Michael Maitland (continues) with Henry Barden (cont), resident producer, Eliza Vassina with Robert Dark, Dennis Olson, Heather Bagg, Anne Austin, David Smith or Grant Dobson, Robert Robinson, Graham Lewis, Paul Watson-Smith

Leviathan Songs (Donizetti) in Italian 2 July (continues) 8 July (TV) Conductor, Richard Stange producer, George Ogilvie, designer, Michael Friedlander, resident producer, Michael Beauchamp, with Joan Sutherland, Robert Harris, Margara Elkins, Kate Stevens or Paul Harris

Orchestra (Bart) in French 8 July, 8 July (cont), 11-18, 20-26 July, 21 July (cont) Conductor, Richard Stange producer/designer, Tony Langan and resident producer, Michael Beauchamp, with Hagarita Tourangeau, Deborah Cambridge, Donald Smith or Ron

Stewart, Raymond Myers or Peter van der Stoep

Star Angles (Pizzaro and Pizzaro) (Last available in Sydney, 14-18, 22 July) Conductor, Richard Stange producer, Marlene Gelin, board designer, Desmond Ogby in Star Angles, Joan Sutherland, Rosina Randwick, Heather Bagg, Herta Wilson, Lesley Stenard, Sylvia Johnson in Porters, Roger Rappin, David Potts, Robert Alford, John Wright, George Papp

AUSTRALIAN THEATRE Newcastle (01 0841)

The City Mergers, by Tennessee Williams, An Opera Theatre Group production produced by Frank Hale, directed by Bill Ashken, designed by Paul Nelson, With Barbara Marrot (Continuing)

AUSTRALIAN THEATRE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE (09 9021)

I Suppose I'll Have To by Mattel Conn, directed by Raymond Grenville, The Adversity, by John Maitland, and Dooley, by Richard Tallich, both directed by John Wegg all designed by Yvonne Toss (Plus Where Your Own Success directed by the company (Continuing on schools tour of north west NSW to 16 July)

BALMAIN BEACH (01 7420)

4-musicians, by Ray Lynam, directed by Peter Bagg (16-18 July)

BONAPARTE THEATRE RESTAURANT (02 1515 or 02 1246)

Nothing until September

BOCH PAVILION THEATRE (06 7311 or 20 1173)

Six Australian plays from the National Playwrights' Conference in repertory, with a mix of the original cast members in possible (10-16 July)

CIVIC THEATRE Newcastle (01 0171)

Boeing Boeing, by Marc Camoletti, adapted from the French by Berkeley Cross, directed by Doug Fisher, designed by Neil Dowd, starring Richard G. Sullivan, with Doug Fisher, Shirley Cameron, Kate Stott, Judith Woodcock (to 27 July)

CONSERVATORIUM OF MUSIC (21 4208 or 21 9171)

The Bartered Bride (Smetana) in English 2 July (cont) Director, Russell Jackson, musical director, Eric Chapman, set designer, Michael O'Keefe, With Amanda Thorne, Jennifer Lusk, Paul, John Van or Geoffrey Harris, Geoffrey Crook, Jonathan Hughes, Colin Gell, Ben Audette, Colin, Clair Ford, Gary Horne, Sylvia Clarke, David Watson

ENSEMBLE (02 0077)

Raymond Gell, by Boris and Samuel Spivakov, directed by Helen Gordon, designed by Doug Anderson (10-21 July)

GENERAL (02 0011)

A Man For All Seasons, by Robert Bolt, directed and designed by Calum Clifford, with Michael Roney, Elizabeth Sicks, Lauren Barker, Dennis Allen (Continuing)

HER MAJESTY'S (012401)

A Ghana film, original production composed, photographed and directed by Michael Bennett, co-photographer. Rob Aron took by James Kirkwood and Nicholas Datta, music by Martin Handbach, lyrics by Richard Eddins, choreography and direction inherited for Australia by Brynesh Lee and Jeff Hamlin. Cost of 56 (Contemporary).

INDEPENDENT (012777)

Stellar by William Shakespeare directed by Graham Dean. With Billy Hays, Carol Crumell, Peter White, Charles Moody, Lucy Clifford, Robert Kromm, Raymond O'Reilly. (To 2 July)

KILLARA 600 COFFEE THEATRE (0057352)

Wells Garden, directed by John Horvat, with John Horvat, Peter Parkinson, Christine Pegg (Contemporary)

MARIAN STREET (001104)

The Mays: Master by George Feydeau, directed by Alan Dean, designed by Bruce Phillips. With Lynn Randolph, Mark Hinchey, Philip Hines, Martin John, Al Thomas, Kenneth Lund, Dennis Parker, Guy Peake. (To 9 July)

Continuing a new comedy by Alan Ayckbourn, adapted by Ted Craig, designed by Bruce Phillips. (From 15 July)

MARIONETTE THEATRE OF AUSTRALIA (0171618)

Shoe, written and directed by Richard Bradshaw, and Mandy, directed by the company and directed by Richard Bradshaw (Schools over 50-year olds, contemporary)

MINE HALL THEATRE RESTAURANT (0081212)

Coal for Power or Faith or Perseverance, written and directed by Michael Baddy, with Alan Harvey, John Allen, Anne Smiler (Classical)

MUSIC LOFT THEATRE RESTAURANT (0171641)

Once Upon A Time, by Peggy MacLennan and Brian Toppens, directed by Peggy MacLennan, with the Toppens Family and Lee Young. (To 21 July)

The Calves Dance Show, produced by William Orr, with Bryan Davis, W.P. Bennett, David Gellman. (From 27 July)

NOLA THEATRE (0194616)

Four A Free Man by Tim Stoppard, directed by Paul Jones, designed by Andrew Marshall. With Kerry O'Neill, Terry Miles, Antonette Blackland, Denise Scott, Bruce Woodhead, Rick McDonald, Dick May, Sara Ross (Contemporary)

NIMROD (0183002)

Upstairs: Much Ado About Nothing, by William Shakespeare, directed by John Bell, designed by Larry Entwistle (Classical) and Kate Crispin (contemporary). With Robert Alexander, Margaret Blane, Peter Carroll, Drew Farnham, Ivor Lewis, Deborah Kennedy, Tony Littlejohn, Anna, Gordon McDougall, Dorian Scott, Tony Sheldon, Alan Tolan, Anne Vokola. (To 21 July)

Going Home, by Adam de Green, directed by Richard Whittow. (From 28 July)

Dominate: A Sketch of the Assassination of Jack Manning, an Australian Performing Group production starring Max Galloway. (From 1 July)

OLD TOTE (0401122)

Deems Tate, Opera House: The Three Sisters, by Anton Chekhov, directed by Bill Redmond, designed by Angus Redmond. With

Jackie Pearce, Jennifer Cline, Marlene Mangan, Elizabeth Alexander. (From 15 July)

Parade Theatre: Ensigns of Arts by Colin Finn, directed by Peter Collingswood, designed by Irene Tate. With Ben Haddock, Stuart Peckham, Roy Gifford, Don Preston, Brian Ross, Catherine Wallace. (To 14 July)

My Time by Patrick White, directed by Jon Stewart, designed by Brian Toppens. With Kate Hapworth, Arthur Dignam, Max Collier. (From 27 July)

York Theatre: Seymour Centre: Wild Day, by John O'Grady, directed by Nick Hodge, designed by Anne Pissart. With Angela Terry, Robin, Robin, Kewington, Anne Dugg, Grahame, Richard Mottle. (To 28 July)

Q THEATRE (00115703)

A Most Good, by Peter Kenna, directed by Karen Jackson, designed by Arthur Davis. With Dennis Warburton, Kim Hadden, Ben Harlow. (At Ballina, Ingleton, Perth: 1-3 July and 20-24 July. Civic Centre, Blacktown: 6-10 July. Murdoch Rehabilitation Centre, Perth: 12-17 July)

OSCAR'S HOLLYWOOD PALACE THEATRE RESTAURANT, Sans Souci (0184416)

Cometh to the Palace, staged and photographed by Ross Collins, with Judi Connell, Jan Hagan, Glenn, Foreman, Peter Franks, Terry Whitlock. (To 2 July)

The Colour Storm, directed by John F. Stephens. (From 5 July)

ROCKDALE MUNICIPAL OPERA COMPANY (0174814)

Johnnie Brown (Ollendorf) in English. 26, 27, 28 July, 24 July (over). Sanderson, Colin Ashton, director and designer. Robert Hinchey, choreographer, Ross Handman. With Robert Gird, Graham Martin, Judy Clay, Paula Ross, David Gellford, Margaret Winkler. Peter Avery.

ST JAMES LUNCHEON PLATINUM (0121376)

From Sea to Sun, by Tony Ralph, directed by Peter Williams. With Bill Bode, Denise Newman, Jo Hume. (To 8 July)

Don't Go Near the Fridge, Mrs Jenkins, by David Newman, directed by Peter Williams, with Kay Richard. (From 11 July)

STIMOLS CENTRE (0103516)

Dominate: Master for Measure by William Shakespeare, directed by Neil Armfield, presented by the English Department drama students. (To 12 July)

SPLARKNEY THEATRE RESTAURANT, Kensington (0407144)

The Big Bang Show continued by Hugh Hale and Bryan Davis, directed by Hugh Hale with Peter Corbett and Ross Sharp. (Contemporary)

SYDNEY OPERA HOUSE (010555)

Recognition Hall: The Judas Experiment, an audio-visual adventure directed by Mike Shirley. (Contemporary)

THEATRE ROYAL (0118577 or 0118111)

Four Penitents, by Miles Star, directed by Jeff Campbell, designed by Patrick Robertson. With George Legrand, Bruce Spence, Ray Wold, Henry, Songs, Wendy Gifford, Lynda Murrin, John Brehm, Brian Harrison, Gordon Glenwright. (To 17 July)

Strong, strong, by Marc Carroll, adapted from the French by Jeanette Cross, directed by Doug Fisher, designed by Bill Dowd, starring Richard O'Sullivan, with Doug Fisher, Shirley

Carroll, Kate Steel, Judith Woodroffe. (From 28 July)

WHITE HORSE HOTEL, Newtown (011002)

The Judas Experiment, by Rick Minter, Malcolm Lindsay and Frances Kirby, presented and directed by Ian Tucker and Hugh Hale with Ian Tucker. (Contemporary)

QUEENSLAND

ARTS THEATRE (0121446)

The Shylock House by Richard Berman, Director and Designer Jennifer Robinson. 30 June-30 July

David Williamson and The Fire Downed and Directed by Gordon Shaw. (Saturdays)

CANERATA (0011)

Enter by August Strindberg, Director, Shirley Lander, Avon Theatre. (29 July-August)

HER MAJESTY'S (012777)

London Music Festival (July)
Melrose in Concert Presented by Australian Concert Enterprises (6-9 July) Fanny's Fanny's by Ian Taylor, Director, Ted Craig, designer, David Brown. With Ian Brown and John Fossan. Presented by Australian Classical Trust. (12-16 July)

LA BOTE (011921 or 1294)

Severely Disabled by Ted Hagle, Director. Rick Hinchey, designer, Bill Haycock. With Michael MacAlister, Phil Thomas. (Sing Amers. 1-17 July, final performance.)
The Day by Michael Cox

QUEENSLAND BALLET (011101)

Ballet for Theatre presented by Arts Council of Australia (Queensland) and Queensland Ballet Company

19th Choreographer, Charles Lenoir
Dances out of Court Choreographer, Peter Dayrell

The Lark Choreographer, Grahame Walsh
Le Pêcheur (The Fisherman) Choreographer, Angus Beaumont. (Monday, 1 July, Cairns, 11 and 12 July, Ingleton, 14 July, Clarendon, 20-24 July, Apr. Home 18-19 July, Rockhampton, 19 and 20 July, Warrumbungle, 21 July, Newcastle, 27 July, Gold Coast, 27 July, Lismore, 25 July)

QUEENSLAND OPERA COMPANY (0117118)

Conducts Executive by Peter Mazzetta
Producer, John Thompson, designer, James Redmond, conductor, Graeme Yang
I Pagine by Rogers Lonsdale, Producer, John Thompson, designer, James Redmond, conductor, Graeme Yang. City Hall, 12 and 16 July

QUEENSLAND THEATRE COMPANY (0113041)

The Lord of the Aardvarks by John Powers
Director, Joe MacCollum, Designer, Peter Cooke. With Don Crady, David Chender, Douglas Hodge, Johnny Johnson, Peter Lewis, Kim Lytle, Phil Mary, Russell Newman, Bruce Parr. (12 June-4 July)

St Asen by George Hurrell, Director, Joe MacCollum, Designer, Peter Cooke. (Open 20 July)

TWELFTH NIGHT (02 9585)
Mrs. Wiggins's Production by George Kennedy
Shaw Director: John Whitley designer: Jerrisa
Carruthers (01 18 July)

TASMANIA

TASMANIAN PUPPET THEATRE (01 7994)

Chrs. CHIRIL, Bruce Mervin (2-5 July) Puppet Theatre, Launceston (Western) (1-5 July)

THEATRE ROYAL (04 6064)

Turnaway's Turnaway's Mosaic Street Producers John Gifford and Sullivan areas, directed by Tali Craig (10-13 July)
Turnaway's Mosaic (10-13 July)
Turnaway's Opera Company, Cool Fair Turn Directed by Michael Lushbury (From 18 July)

SOUTH AUSTRALIA

ARTS THEATRE (07 5175)

Workshop production to 2 July

FESTIVAL CENTRE (01 2905)

Festival Theatre Australian Ballet, Merv
Wheeler, with Doreen Margot Forsyth, Marilyn Jones, Marilyn Rowe, Gailene Scott, Alan
Miller, Walter Mueller, Kelvin Cox, Jonathan
Kellie, Gary Newman (1-21 July)
Space ACT 3 Screen Food, musical by Tony Gardner Director: Malcolm Haylock (30 June-
2 July)
For Playhouse see SATC

THE JAM FACTORY

The Jambies First Walkie Director, Andy Gee Flinders University Drama Centre (29 June-
2 July)

LITTLE THEATRE

1 Show 1 Show 1 Show to Foot Street Fair by John Kennard Director, Andrew Sharp (A1) (28
Continuing to 4 July)
Globe Killing Game by Eugene Ionesco Director, Steve Brown (01 16 and 30-31 July)

Q THEATRE (02 9451)

The Golden Years by Bill Moxon and Betty
Gore Director, Bill Moxon (30-31 July)

STATE OPERA (02 5118 or 552 1044)

The Playhouse Adelaide Festival Centre (01 2585)
The Cossacks of Pigeon (Mozzart) in English Conductor: Mervyn Fildes, director, Adrian Slack, designer, John Carrivick with John Hume, Gregory Drumper, Angela
Dewing, Thomas Edwards, Daphne Harris,
Peter Humphrey, Judith Thompson, Norma
Knight, Kevin Mullen, John Wood, David
Wentham (11, 16, 22, 23, 27, 29, 30 July)

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN THEATRE COMPANY (01 5185)

Playhouse: The Early on Sky by Michael Carr and Rian Blair Director, Colin George designer, Rodney Ford (To 16 July) New season opens 12 August with Anne Get Your Own

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN DANCE COMPANY Country tour (20 July-12 August)

UNION HALL

Romeo and Juliet by William Shakespeare
Director: Jim Wile University of Adelaide Theatre Guild Ensemble (14-18 July, 13-18 July)

VICTORIA

ALEXANDER THEATRE (06 5028)

The Cossacks directed by Peter Oyston for the Alexander Theatre Company (To 21
July)
The Crucible directed by Peter Oyston for the Alexander Theatre Company (From 23 July)

AUSTRALIAN PERFORMING GROUP (041 1154)

From Factory: First Theatre: The Cossacks
Show by John Kennard directed by Carol Fisher
From Factory: Back Theatre: The Mass Group (To 31 July)

COMEDY THEATRE (065 3115)

Doctor in Love by Richard Gordon. Produced by Gery Van Eyck and Paul Doran, with Robert Ireland and Geoffrey Gurney (To 10
July)

MRS MAURIST'S THEATRE (061 5211)

The Twinner And All That Jazz A musical collaboration with John Deschamps, Caroline Gifford and John O May Musical director,
Michael Spack photographer, Wilton
Pittard design, Trina Parker Produced by P.C. Williamson Productions Ltd and Michael Edgley International Pty Ltd (Continuing)

LA MAMA (07 6061)

Teach Anatomy: Festival (Dance and available)

LAST LAUGH (041 6281)

Radio Theatre: a Circus or My Song, directed by Tim Robinson

MILBOURNE THEATRE COMPANY (045 1100)

Antony and Cleopatra by William Shakespeare, adapted by Ray Lawler Directed by John Somers, script designed by Richard Frank, costumes designed by Marie Maxwell (To 23
July)

The Merchant of Venice Directed by John Somers (From 24 July)

Rainald Street: The Club by David Williamson
Directed by Rodney Fildes, designed by Brian Gordon (To 21 July)

Theatre in Education: Let It or Let It be directed by Jonathan Hardy The Refresher by John Fennell Director, Tony Gurney. Men From Boys by John Wood Directed and designed by Robert Lowe
Company A and B Metropolitan areas

PLAYBOX THEATRE (01 4815)

Garden Chapel in The Absence of Benjamin Franklin by Steve J. Spence Musical Theatre production presented by Paradise Productions

(From 1 July)

PRINCE OF THE STREE (045 2011)

Victorian State Opera J. Doyle (Maczavelli)
Conductor: Richard David, director, Robert Lawson, designer, Marie Maxwell With Ann
Cannon, Helma Neukam, Barry Brown, Janet Dewson, Jean Thomas, Aral Sakmarak, John Morton, Hartley Pennington Jack Lane
Orchestra: Conductor: Michael de Mollatone
(1, 8, 9 July)

Macbeth Macbeth Presented by Michael Edgley International Pty Ltd in association with Derek Glynn (From 25 July)

RE KIDDA PRINCE (01 6011)

Napoleon and King London Festival Ballet in Romeo and Juliet Presented by Michael Edgley International Pty Ltd (25-30 July)

TOTAL THEATRE (061 4991)

Let Me People Love A musical celebration of sex by Karl Wilson first Directed by Peter Baker produced by Eric Davis (To July 13)

VICTORIAN STATE OPERA (01 5011)

Paper and Flowers and Thugs on The River
Love of Prospero Project, by Peter Narrows, Continuing on schools tour metropolitan area (See also Princess Theatre)

WESTERN AUSTRALIA

URIC THEATRE RESTAURANT (01 5995)

The First Part Year Show with Joan Sydney
THE HOLE IN THE WALL (01 3044)
Peter Finner by Louis Nemes Director, John Milton (29 June-12 July)
Macbeth Macbeth by Alex Beau Director, Anne Nemes (17 July-August 20)

PLAYHOUSE (01 5400)

Director, Peter by Christopher Hampton
Director, Anne Nemes (30 June-25 July)
M.A.S. People, by Gifford and Sullivan
A.S.P. by Gifford Double bill presented by Gifford and Sullivan Society Director, John Milton (28 July-August)

Queenstown: King Henry by Anne de Green
Director, Andrew Ross (1 July-21 July)

TIE

Wetland by Brian Ford Director, Andrew
Ross Spontaneous Theatre available for booking
On Time (journey) Double bill by Linda
Dewson and Peter Widdow Director, Andrew Ross
Cap'n's Franchise Simon Hopkinson

RINGAL (01 1517)

My Fair Fanny by Charles Lawrence Presented by Australian Stage Productions, with Tim Buckley-Lipson and Judy Nance (30 June-25
July)

WEST AUSTRALIAN GALLERY (01 4441)

Director: Theatre A Season of success including New Music and Love Match by Leigh Wardle (30-31 July)

WEST AUSTRALIAN OPERA (01 5185 or 76 4103)

In 1995

WEST AUSTRALIAN THEATRE COMPANY

In 1995 for building theatres

Coming in August: ten years of Carlton theatre, Marvellous Melbourne by Jack Hibberd and other leading goal-kickers. Including Patrick White by Dorothy Hewett and Max Gillies by John Larkin. Take the punt and subscribe now.

Overseas subscription rates

Sea fare mail	A$25.00	All other countries	A$20.00
By air		Bank drafts in Australian currency should be forwarded to Playhouse Press Pty. Ltd, 104
New Zealand, New Guinea	A$40.00	Commer. St., Richmond, Victoria 3023.
U.K., U.S.A., Germany, Greece, Italy	A$50.00	Australia

Credits

Photos: G. Harrison 17-18, Peter Drummond 20, David Parker 41-42, G. Mulgrew 70, Bobby La Brie collection 8-11, and the theatre companies.
Information courtesy: M & L Coaling Pty. Ltd